E-rok, Pronunciation of Iraq, Name for Kingdom

Occidentals pronounce Iraq E-rok, with the accent on the final syllable. Iraq is the Arab name for the kingdom which occupies practically the whole of the Euphrates valley—Mesopotamia.

It is a region about the size of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Ohio combined, but the boundaries are rather hazy. The country is a plain which lies between Persia, the Persian gulf, the Arabian and Syrian deserts and Kurdistan.

The climate is hot and rather unhealthy, but the Tigris-Euphrates region is wonderfully fertile and irrigation, says a writer in the Cleveland Plain Dealer, would restore the land to the prosperity of the days when Bagdad was one of the world's great capitals and the deeds of the Caliph Haroun Al Rashid were weaving themselves into "The Thousand and One Nights."

Down from Mosul, which occupies the site of ancient Nineveh, to Bagdad, runs one of the links of the famous Berlin-to-Bagdad railway which was one day to have cemented the central powers. The British, who wrested Iraq from the Turks in 1917, extended this road to Basra, or Bassorah, near the gulf. The British mandatory rights, however, were formally renounced and the independence of Iraq recognized by a treaty signed at Bagdad June 30, 1930.

Iraq has great petroleum resources, ranking eighth in the world's supply. The country grows cotton, dates, tobacco, wheat, sheep, cattle and silkworms with equal success.

Difference Between Ale, Beer

Ale is a kind of beer. All ale is beer, but all beer is not ale. Originally the terms were synonymous. Now beer is a general name for all malt liquors, while ale is applied specifically to the paler kinds, the malt of which has not been roasted or burnt. Ale differs from ordinary beer in having a lighter color, a smaller proportion of hops and a higher alcoholic content. It is generally sweeter than beer because it contains more or less unfermented saccharine matter. The application of "ale" and "beer" varies considerably in different countries and localities. Before the adoption of prohibition, American ale was a malt liquor made by "top fermentation," in which the newly formed yeast went to the top and was removed.

Modern Movie Cowboys Ride to Work in New Conditioned Air Cars

The rigors of modern movie cowboy work demand full use of the latest conveniences, as demonstrated during the filming of "The Oregon Trail." Long hours on location, riding the bucking, springless covered wagon shown in the background above, have made the conditioned Nash an essential part of location equipment. Stars of the film, Louise Stanley and Johnny Mack Brown, use the Nash to transport them to the widely separated sets required to give the serial an authentic background. The new Nash, Universal's choice as America's most modern car, is also to be starred in all New Universal productions that call for the use of a car of outstanding style and appearance. The studios recently took delivery of a fleet of nine new Nashes, in four body styles in three Nash series, covering virtually every conceivable need which the ever-changing studio requirements might suggest.
