The Week Before Christmas

As the week before Christmas, the next few days should be devoted exclusively to certain well-defined activities. High up in every Yuletide agenda, the acquisition and decoration of Christmas trees, hanging of holly and mistletoe and sprucing up (no pun) for the holidays are fundamentals of the season. Mistletoe is in abundance, and in excellent condition.

A Christmas tree is a Christmas tree, whatever the size. Everyone ought to have one, big or little and it is to be hoped everyone will. The annual trimming should be something of a ceremony. There should be opposition to artificial holly although there may be argument for the addition of an artificial berry here and there. Every wreath should be adorned by a large red ribbon and nothing more. There has been no artificial mistletoe so far as the corps of artificial mistletoe spies has been able to learn. It is an essential addition to all Christmas decoration, and similarly should be tied with a red ribbon.

There are further considerations that the season imposes upon all persons. They are charged to a high degree with the responsibility of acquiring a certain amount of Christmas spirit, which consists of being in a hurry to get things done and of being pleasant about doing them. The giving of gifts, of course, is fundamental, as is the injunction, "Good Will To Men."

Probably there is no point in attempting to catalogue Christmas. People observe its traditions not because someone tells them to, but because there is an inward feeling that demands outward expression. It is merely that the season approaches so swiftly and that Christmas may be here before we know or have done anything about it that this reminder of its duties and pleasures is submitted.

Longer Days

Days will soon be getting longer, and it will be a good thing. Of course, in actuality all days are the same length, but some have less sunshine than others. But if it were not for the fact the process of nature which makes the nights daily longer, goes into reverse the first day of winter, well, there soon wouldn't be any daylight.

In fact, up north where the Eskimo live and Santa Claus gets his reindeer, there is no daylight at this time of year and not much for the natives to do but hibernate. There the passing of the shortest day really is an event, because it means that before long there will be daylight again, starting at first with just a little and ending up next summer with twenty-four hours of it a day.

Which just goes to show that man either has too much or not enough of practically everything.

Georgia's Gold

In other times, the discovery in the same month of rich gold deposits in California's El Dorado county and at Dahlonega in Georgia would have started a gold rush of most of the continent's footloose citizenry in one direction or another. But the spirit of adventurism now finds other outlets, and the day of staking a claim on almost any unsettled land is largely over.

Until the recent strike, few knew of Georgia as a gold producer, and yet until the Civil War the government operated a mint at Dahlonega, supported by the gold from the nearby hills. The Carolinas and other neighboring states, with Georgia, have turned out more than fifty million dollars worth of the metal, and this, while it is less than California has produced in a single one of its great years, was enough to make the section the nation's chief provider of gold until the strike near Sutter's Fort in '49 turned all eyes westward.

Self-sacrifice is a noble virtue, provided, of course, that the beneficiary is worth it.

A dermatologist in Minnesota advises the bald to buy a toupee and forget it. But some of the toupees one sees are commemorating it.
