Looking Backward.

mile or more. That was too much for our enemy, lying hid behind the sage brush upon the banks of the bluff watching for us. Up they jumped and began firing, and we were not slow in answering.

Not long until all was quiet again, but look, up there, see below, large bodies of smoke rose up into the air; they were burning us out, it was a—! to come! The dead broom straw burned greedily, and sent large sheets of fire and smoke up into the air. Without waiting a moment, all four of us with hunting knives began to cut the grass beneath the wagon and around the camp and to set back fire. Then we led one horse next to the bank of the Sandy, threw our weight against it and down it went the steep bank into the water about five feet deep; the second horse being dispatched the same way, we grabbed the blankets, hid the rifles, ammunition and revolvers under the bank, and down we went; quickly the blankets were drawn over the horses' heads, water splashed on them, and underneath we awaited our doom. There was a roaring and cracking, a heat and a sharp choking smoke, but we held out; our backfire had done its work, burning a large circle around us, and when the two fires met, it was a fight between the air more than fifty feet, and down they came; they passed us on both sides and nothing but cinders, coals and ashes, with smoke here and there, remained. The district had been cleared of its vegetation.

This day and the next we waited for further developments; we had fed our last flour to the horses, the meat was spoiled, but fortunately the trout began to bite and we pulled up some nice fellows; a good bed of coals served as a stove, the fish rolled in wet hay and placed in the ashes were cooked to perfection; the hay burned hard and was taken off and the scales and skin stuck to it, thus uncovering the most delicious white meat, which served to satisfy our hunger. However, all feed for the team was gone. Something had to be done, and the first thing was to find whether or not we were still besieged; so two of us went to scout the bluffs; some time passed when the first one returned with two blankets bespattered with blood, in one of them a bullet hole; then the other one returned; no Indians in sight. Now it was the turn for the two others to see what they could find; one went down stream, the other up stream. The one from below returned with encouraging news, as this was the outlet for the overland route; then the last one returned; "they are gone," he said. They had crossed the stream a mile or two above; they had horses with poles fastened to the saddles upon which they carried their wounded comrades. We struck out in a hurry. POHL.
