A Legend of Christ the Saviour.

At one of the highways through Palestine and crossing the river of Jordan, there lived a man by the name of Nicodemus. Right near the crossing he had a building and around it was a few acres of land which he tilled and worked to raise grain and grass, vegetables and different kinds of fruit.

In stature he was herculean, in disposition, kind to everybody. His principle work to make his living was to carry travelers upon his mighty shoulders across the stream. One day it so happened, Joseph, his wife Mary, and their six-year old son Jesus, came to be set across Nicodemus not knowing the strangers and it being near dark, invited the family to stop with him over night; his invitation accepted, they ate their frugal meal, passed a time in conversation and retired. Early the next morning after partaking of another meal they started. Nicodemus shouldered Joseph and set him down on the opposite shore, then he returned and carried Mary over, and last placed Jesus on his shoulders. He had not found any unusual effort to carry the grown people through the water, and it seemed strange when this child of six years began to tax his strength and with every step he made the burden became heavier and heavier. Already Nicodemus began to perspire and only with the greatest of effort he set the child down at the feet of the waiting parents. After receiving many thanks for his kindness, he asked how it was that this little child was heavier than anything he had ever carried. To which Jesus answered, "Know ye, dear friend, today you carried the Son of God, the Saviour of the world. Now before we part ask me three wishes and they shall be fulfilled.

Nicodemus after some deliberation asked as first question that his big chair should have the power to hold anything, man, beast or ghost, fast in the seat and not let anything get away without his express wish and order. After awhile he asked that the big cherry tree in his garden should have the same power as the chair, to hold and keep anything among its limbs from getting down until Nicodemus would order it. And last of all he wished that he could live one hundred years longer. Jesus granted each in the name of his heavenly Father, and the three departed.

Now Nicodemus, like so many men, and women too, liked to play a game of chance. He had a neighbor who often came evenings to see him and to have a pleasant game. As long as this neighbor won he was very friendly and sociable, however, when luck was against him he would jump up and run off, a way which displeased Nicodemus. The next time he came the neighbor was seated in the big chair. They played. The neighbor lost and wanted to run away, but could not get up. At last Nicodemus told him to get up, and wondering what held him, went home, but never learned of the power invested in the chair, otherwise he would have failed to come again.

Time went on, the blossoms of the cherry tree had turned to fruit, and the tree was loaded. Many seasons it was so before, many times the boys of the neighborhood climbed up into the branches and stole the fruit. But this season what kept them away? Once or twice they had tried to steal—they could get up but never down until Nicodemus released them one by one, and as he came down each received a licking, and that kept them off. Time passed. One after another of the old friends were laid to rest. Others came and died, but Nicodemus kept on living. One day, after a long, long time, a stranger called at the house. He was very poor and lean and carried a sythe on his shoulder.

Introducing himself as the old boremán, Death, told Nicodemus that his time was up in five minutes. Old Nicodemus invited Death to sit down until he was ready to take him into the beyond.

The five minutes passed and the occupant of the chair was fast, could not get up nor away.

Three days had passed and there he was, still upon the seat of the chair; finally Death became angry, and asked what he could do to let him go.

"I let you go if you agree to let me live a hundred years longer,"—the bargain was made, and off Death went to make up for lost time.

A hundred years is a long time. However, the room in the paper is getting short, and so I let you wait for a few days. You will find the continuation of this legend in the next issue of the Bandon RECORDER.
