We have always thought of our lumber industry as a vanishing industry and felt that once the big trees of Coos county were felled it would be two or three generations before another crop of timber would be ready to harvest. But a few days ago we heard one of the Smith-Powers company quoted as saying that they have just been logging a tract from which the timber was cut only 30 years ago, and that were mills using ten times the amount of lumber they do now the natural growth on their holdings would still keep pace with the destructin of the forests by their logging operations.—Coquille Sentinel.
