Perils Faced in Attempt to Go Down Unexplored River—Resume of Final Stage of Journey Against Great Odds, Which Colonel Expected to Complete in April.

News from Anthony Flata, the arctic explorer, that the Roosevelt South American Expedition, of which he is a member, has had his equipment and baggage interfered with by Colonel Roosevelt's intention to complete his trip in April.

The former president sailed for South America on Oct. 4, after having received a hearty send-off the night before from more than 2,000 persons in New York.

He spent several weeks in the Argentine Republic in November and December, traveling more than 5,000 miles through that country by every conceivable means of transportation except aeroplane. In December the party started from Buenos Aires by slow stages up the Parana and Paraguayan rivers.

Colonel's Letter Tells Plans. The last letter to be received by the American Museum of Natural History from Colonel Roosevelt was dated Jan. 16 from Tapirnoan, in Matto Grosso, a large province in the south central part of Brazil. This letter was received by Frank M. Chapman, curator of birds in the American museum.

Colonel Roosevelt stated that the party expected to reach the headwaters of an unexplored river in a month or six weeks and that he expected to go down this, taking with him his son, Kermit; Anthony Flata and George K. Cherris, a representative of the museum. He also wrote that this exploring party would be accompanied down the river by Colonel Bondon and other Brazilian members of the party.

No mention was made of the name of this unexplored river, but in another letter to his family the colonel had referred to this river as the Rio Duayna or the River of Doubt. The headwaters of this river are at Matto Grosso, between the Madeira and Tapajos rivers, two large streams that flow northward to the Amazon.

The Roosevelt party reached Corumbá, in Brazil, on the upper Parana river, on Dec. 15. A little north of Corumbá this river is not navigable. The headwaters of the Parana river are in the plateau that extends into Matto Grosso. The sources of rivers that run southward to join the Rio de la Plata are sometimes within a few miles of the streams that flow down the north side of the plateau and become tributaries of the Amazon.

By Horseback Five Hundred Miles. From the headwaters of the Parana it is a journey of 500 miles by horseback to the headwaters of the River of Doubt. These headwaters are on a great plateau, between 3,000 and 4,000 feet above sea level. From there the rivers drop abruptly to the floor of the Amazon, making navigation exceptionally dangerous because of the numerous rapids and waterfalls. The Madeira and the Tapajos both contain great waterfalls, among them being some of the greatest in South America, if not in the world. The river between those two streams, in which it is thought that the Roosevelt party "lost everything," is believed to have equally dangerous rapids and falls.

On March 15 a message was received in Rio Janeiro from Colonel Bondon stating that the party, after a 500 mile journey on horseback, had reached Barro de Malanta. He said no savages had been met and that Colonel Roosevelt was in good health. Barro de Malanta is on the border between the states of Matto Grosso and Amazonas and is near the headwaters of two rivers, the Commaunama and Gyparano, which flow into the upper Madeira.

The Madeira river joins the Amazon some distance below Manaus, the first city which the party had expected to encounter on their arrival in civilization. Barro de Malanta, whence Mr. Flata sent his message, is several hundred miles below Manaus.
