The dredge California will shift its moorings, and tugs will criss-cross in all directions. Should their drags catch on the F-4, a chain net will be woven around the submerged boat and the floating crane from Pearl Harbor will attempt a direct lift.

Despair supplanted hope earlier in the day when two divers discovered that chains from the dredger California, which had been fould with some-thing on the floor of the ocean outside Honolulu harbor since Friday, were not attached to the lost craft but to an old anchor.

All the resourses at the command of naval officers here had been employed for two days and nights in an effort to aise this anchor which was suppose to be the F-4.

Streams of bubbles seen rising to patches of oil had given encouragement to the belief that the dredge's chains had become lodged on the submarine, which disappeared Thursday when at

Efforts to raise the object that held the dredge's chains falled and crews of men worked untiringly to bring what was confidently believed to be the undersea craft into more shallow water. Naval officers, expressing the hope that life might remain in the bodies of some, at least, of the 21 men imprisoned in the F-4, sought to expedite operations in every way possible.
