NO SLUMBER FOR TRAVELER

Hospitality in Congoland Carried to Extremes—Men in That Country Are the Homemakers.

A stranger going through Congoland is at liberty to stop at any hut and spend the night or remain as long as he feels inclined. This is expected, and no conversation is even required to negotiate the arrangements.

But if the stranger is tired, he is "out of luck," because hospitality in Congoland is expressed in a strange fashion. To give their guests a real welcome the host and hostess gather all of their neighbors and friends around their home and plan for the evening's entertainment. They dance for him, and are so anxious to give him a pleasant visit that they keep the dance up all night. He is expected to appreciate it and, naturally, should not show any signs of fatigue.

After a sleepless night he is surprised to find his hostess out in the fields, bright and early, with her cigar in her mouth—because in Congoland only the women smoke; the men prefer to take snuff. They consider smoking effeminate.

The women not only do all the heavy work in the fields, but sell the produce as well. The men take over the domestic duties. It is no strange sight to see the man of the house engaged in doing the family washing, and then hanging the clothes out to dry on the branches of the trees around his home.

After he has his "Monday's work" out of the way he takes his sewing basket and sits down in the shade and does the family mending, and does it well.

The Helpful Caddy.

At one of the New England golf clubs a young lady who is very popular with her caddies arranged a match with an old woman who is proud of her mediocre ability. The young lady, a good player, wished to lose the game out of courtesy and for social reasons. Her opponent was in even worse form than usual and the girl grew desperate. She seemed unable to prevent her opponent from losing. Finally she told her caddy that she would like to lose the match. "Ah, miss," he muttered, "I didn't know that. Here I've been stamping on her ball every time it gets in the long grass."

Butterflies Eye-Spots.

What do the eye-spots on butterflies' wings mean? The naturalists say, frankly, "We do not know." It is thought that these eye-spots may have some utilitarian application. They form one of the most intricate of all natural designs. The fact that butterflies have been captured with their eye-spots pierced, as if from the attack of birds, has been used as an argument in favor of the view that they must be "protective markings," imitating eyes because birds strike at the eyes of their victims. But this suggestion is hardly regarded as satisfactory. Among butterflies the most striking examples of eye-spots are found on the under surface of the wings.

CARGOES THAT SAILORS FEAR

Either Sugar, Coffee, or Cotton Are Considered Far More Dangerous Than Dynamite.

At first thought it would seem that dynamite was a cargo to be carefully avoided, but from a sailor's point of view there are far more dangerous cargoes. He dreads, for instance, a cargo of sugar. Put hundreds of tons of cane sugar in casks in the hold of a vessel and let the ship steam through a spell of hot weather. The odor is sickening. The sailors cannot get the sweet taste out of their mouths, and crave vinegar or lemon juice—anything sour. They lose their appetites and are always glad when a voyage on which the cargo was sugar is over. Coffee is as disagreeable as sugar, in addition to being very dangerous.

Cotton is a really dangerous cargo. If a little oil happens to touch raw cotton the result is spontaneous combustion. A single bale of cotton saturated with such an oil as boiled linseed and lying at the bottom of the hold can be compared only to a slow match attached to a bomb.

Acids and other chemicals form dangerous cargoes. Carbide of calcium, for example, is more dangerous than dynamite. Acetylene gas is made from this chemical, and the gas is constantly given off if the product is exposed to air.

London.—The election in Great Britain with all its surprises, produced nothing which attracted wider interest and comment than the defeat of Winston Spencer Churchill, ex-secretary for the colonies, at Dundee, by the prohibitionist candidate, E. Scrymgeour. In the new parliament Premier Bonar Law will command a majority of approximately 80 over all parties combined.
