OREGON FLAX

Nearly a million dollars are being invested in two linen mills at Salem, one is completed and a second one will be built the coming spring. These are in addition to the state plant-and by the way it is the largest flax manufacturing plant in the United States. These are the foundations for a big industry that will no doubt develop in the Willamette Valley, the State Market Agent believes.

The permancy of the flax business is what recommends it to any locality that can grow and manufacture flax. There is hardly a pound of waste from the field to the finished products-every part of the growth is utilized in some manner. It is a wonderfully valuable product. And flax growing is about like hay. With normal weather conditions it will yield about two tons to the acre, which the state is paying $76 for. Under irrigation the yield is larger.

More than one hundred mllion dollars' worth of manufactured articles and by-products of flax are imported into this country annually. The Willamette Valley is adapted to both growth and manufacture-soil, moisture, dearth of electricity and mild climate-and as there are nationwide markets for all flax products it would seem that eventually both growing and manufacture would hecome major industries and of great benefit to the state. Flax experts who have investigated conditions of the valley state that it is the only known locality where flax can be both grown and manufactured in the same locality.

Before being entirely crowded out of the transportation business by auto cars and busses, the street railway car is to be improved with the addition of eight-wheel brakes, bumpers, smoking compartments, floodlighting, individual leather seats, better spring suspension, etc. All of which will be thankfully received by a public that has already been converted to travel comfort in the suto bus, which it will continue to patronize to the contrary nothwithstanding or holding onto the dangling strap to maintain its equilibrium.
