Ten years ago peace was declared between the Allies and Germany. It would seem that after the terrible struggle between the great nations of the world, with the bloodshed and horror that goes with war, such a thing as war would be forever abolished, but will it? Of course there have been many different propositions to abolish war, of which Kellogg's peace-pact is the most outstanding. Its idea is to outlaw war among the nations. But will all the nations abide by this treaty?

Jealousy and distrust of each other is a great factor that stands in the way of abolishing war. Each nation seems to want all the rest of the nations to disarm, but each is unwilling to disarm herself. England wants France to abolish submarines, who in turn wants the ban lifted on light cruisers. Submarines are the most powerful armament which France possesses, while light cruisers are the most suitable for the protection of England's trade routes.

Airplanes are being manufactured in great quantities by all the large nations, and these planes are not all small passenger carrying planes but are large fighting planes. What does this mean? Are these planes being manufactured at a tremendous expense by the governments just for pleasure? With little countries always bickering at each other and with their powerful armies, how can war be averted? War is always possible until each nation controls death-dealing inventions that will make war so terrible that the nations will be too afraid to go to war. Let us hope that that time will soon come when all the countries can live in peace with each other.
