Portland Wood Burned

Hundreds of cords of wood, which were cut last winter on the Kelly tract, two and a half miles west of Beaverton, by the city of Portland, to give employment to the needy unemployed of the city, was burned on the ground, where it was cut the past week.

There were originally about 8000 cords, but there had been removed probably half of it to the city, the remaining portion being burned last Thursday, Friday and Saturday.

The wood should have been moved long ago, but it seems Portland was unable to sell, owing to the fact that the city dealers cut the price a half dollar under what Portland asked for this wood. A short time ago the city decided to meet the price of the dealers, but it yet had on hand the bulk of its wood, part of which was piled up in the city. Just recently, however, Portland sold what it had left on the Kelly place, about 4000 cords, to a dealer, who is reported to have had the wood well insured.

A break in the water pipe in Dr. Hetu's office in the Cady building early yesterday morning caused several occupants of the building to lose an hour's early morning snooze. There was little damage done—more in the Cady & Pegg grocery store into which the water leaked through the plastered ceiling, but as the water ran through more in the center of the room little damage was done. In Hetu's office the water went through the openings made in the floor for the pipes, and caused only slight inconvenience.

Following the extended dry and warm spell the light showers are most heartily welcomed. Harvesting is now well done, and the rain will help very materially the late crop of vegetables and late potatoes. Of course, hop-picking is just now beginning, but rain is always expected with the commencement of that harvest.

Last week Pete Vandehey tells the Times that he went out to John Vanderzander wheat farm near Buxton, where C. Herbs machine was threshing about 4000 bushels per day, using the wing feeder. The average yield per acre is about 40 bushels, which the average throughout Washington county this season.
