THE LONG TRAIL.

By I. Will Scillet.

Watching from the window he saw the girl disappear down the long avenue of maples, gone from his life; gone in quest of the shadow; but there was no realization until the night. Then came a hurried call over the telephone, only a word, but that word carried with it the entire weight of a destiny hung in the balance.

For three whole days the man paced the solitude of his library, and then fell, exhausted, onto the floor, a broken something that had once been a man. From the ashes of this something there sprang up a being full of fire and energy; full of ambition; full of longing for a new life.

With fevered haste he packed the books, box after box; but nothing else was touched. Then he descended to the street, through the halls once filled with laughter, mirth and revelry, where he once delighted in the gatherings and receptions; but the memory only filled his soul with sorrow for the past and its lost moments.

He opened the door, the glare of sunlight blinded him for a moment as he stepped onto the deep veranda. Without turning he closed the massive oaken door behind him and turned the key in the lock, then descending the steps to the pavement he turned to gaze back at the somber mansion, with the drawn curtains, the locked door, and the grass on the lawn dying from the lack of care.

Then he quickly turned his back and strode down the street. On he walked till the crowded yards and houses gave way to the scattered homes of the suburbs, the green grass of nature and the trees growing as they had when the seeds were first planted.

When evening settled down, grey in the mists of a breaking storm, he found a new straw stack and crawled deep into the fragrant depths, where he slept till the noise of morning awakened him. Stretching his cramped limbs, he made his way to a whispering brook where the water sparkled as it flowed over the white, pebbly sands of the bottom.

Washing his face and finding the operation very refreshing, he strolled over to a farm house by the roadside and offered to work for his breakfast, and the plain little woman that answered his knock, noting the unmistakable civility of the man, set before him a heaping plate of plain country food with plenty of bread and butter accompanied by a huge pitcher of milk.

The meal finished he turned to the woman and offered to help with the morning chores to pay for what he had eaten, but she shook her head, so reaching into his pocket he would have paid her from the scanty purse which he carried. Even this she refused. Thanking her for kindness he went again on his way. Thus, for three years, he tramped the length and breadth of the country, always searching for a place where he might heal the wound, and forget the sorrow, which clung always in his memory. And to him there was no end to the nights and to the days there was no end, no matter whither he wandered.

But one night, as the shadows of a summer evening still clung to the purple hills, and the street lamps of the city blinked and flashed out one by one, he stood on the height of the boulevard that skirted the brow of the hills, where the speeding automobiles filled with boisterous crowds whirled by, the glaring headlights piercing the gathering gloom. His clothes were in rags, his hat was old and several sizes too small for him. On the once smooth shaven face grew a stubby beard, and there was a decided stoop to the once straight shoulders.

As he descended the hill toward the city he paused and, stooping, replaced the piece of a shoe which served as the covering to one of his feet. The night grew darker and the lights below shone like a myriad of stars placed in geometrical design. With his eye he traced their familiar outline. Yes there was his street, and in the semi-illumination he thought he could almost distinguish the shadow line of a mansion with drawn curtains and a locked door.

Reaching into his pocket he drew out a leather pocketbook, and from the depths of this he withdrew a shining key worn so by constant carrying. Holding it in his hand he murmured, "Some place to sleep tonight, even if it is with a dead past." And he laughed a scornful laugh as he viciously kicked a stone into the dark abyss beside the road way.

Beaver Theatre Running Large Program.

The attendance at the Beaver theatre the other evening was large, larger in fact than any previous attendance for some time past, and the manager, Mr. Kamburger has arranged to give an excellent show three times a week and exhibit five reels of good pictures each time. He is mixing the drama well with side splitting comedy and, after you have sympathized with the heroine, sitting in spell bound expectancy until she is safely rescued, then you may enjoy a good laugh over the funny antics of the slap stick comedians.

SKIN TROUBLES NO LONGER BOTHER BEAVERTON PEOPLE.

Do you feel rather lazy and unfit for work? Do you feel tired, even before your day's work is full accomplished, and at night you are nervous? Then you say you have the spring fever. This is only one of the symptoms resulting from impure blood which generally occurs in the spring. There are times when the condition is more severe. There are then, skin eruptions, boils, pimples, and a condition of the skin known as itch. This is very troublesome and hard to cure, and if allowed to run may cause complications. To cure these disagreeable features is uppermost in every mind, and no household is without its special antidote, old fashioned remedies, mostly, which require time for operation. NOT so with ARCHES ALTERNATIVES for this is a quick, sure, and cheap method of treating these conditions. Beaverton People have found this medicine excellent and it is recommended to you by the
