PROGRESS IN CULLING POULTRY GREATER IN LAST TWO YEARS

Prof. Dryden Gives Rules for Finding the Non-Layer and Says Now is Good Time to Cull.

Poulthrymen have learned more in the last two years about culling non-productive poultry than in the previous 50 years, in the opinion of James Dryden, professor of poultry husbandry at Oregon Agricultural College. If the non-layers are culled out the cost of producing eggs falls materially. Now is a good time to cull.

The following are conditions which indicate non-productiveness: Shrivelled condition of the comb, wattles, and ear lobes; closeness of pelvic bones, and keel bone, contracted or hardened condition of the abdomen; yellow shanks and beak in breeds that naturally have yellow shanks and beak such as the leghorns and Plymouth rocks; molting of feathers.

The best breeding hens may be selected by noting from October 15 to November 15 the following characteristics, and bright eyes; well-spread acetaristics:

Incomplete molt, red comb and wat-pelvic bones, good depth from pelvic bones to kee. bone and soft abdomen; pale shanks and beak and vent breeds that have naturally yellow skin and shanks.

Oregon Agricultural College, Corvallis, Sept.—That the people on the farms may have the same opportunities for education, worship, recreation and social contact as those in the city as the big object in view, the college will co-operate with the newly organized farm economics committee of the department of agriculture by holding a community life conference farmers week at O. A. C., December 29-January 3. Prof. E. T. Reed, college editor, has been appointed chairman of a committee to arrange for this conference which is from the rural districts of Oregon.

Aliens of anarchistic tendencies are not needed in this country. Jail or the place from whence they came is the best place for them.

Mrs. Rebecca Marshall and Mrs. Kate Rothermel, both of Williamsport, Penn., who have been spending the summer with relatives in Portland, spent Saturday and Sunday with the family of T. A. Lindsay. Both ladies are aunts of Mrs. Lindsay.

For bed springs and mattresses, see Cady-Pegg Co. 31tf.
