WELLS SALARI, Prop.
Beaverton, Ore.

Oregon Agricultural College, Jan. 24. The school of engineering at the college is having an unusual graduation in many highways and bridge construction work in the past of a letter to G. V. Stinson, of the highway engineering department, from G. B. McCallough, state bridge engineer. Mr. McCallough was formerly with the department of civil engineering of the college.

All of the 1922 graduates of the highway engineering department and many other former O. A. C. men are holding positions with the state department. McCallough gives the following recommendations of the O. A. C. graduates that have come under his notice:

"We are employing a large number of O. A. C. men in pavement and road construction throughout the state and I have nothing but the most favorable reports at all times of these men. Not only is their technical work satisfactory, but the attitude of these men, the clean-cut and well defined manner of thinking which characterizes their work at all times is satisfactory to the extreme."

Oregon Agricultural College, Jan. 24.—Wilbur W. Wood, of Beaverton, is taking an active part in the preparation of the Beaver Annual, the college year-book. Wood is doing work on the art staff. He is a junior in landscape gardening, and a member of the staff of the Oregon Countryman, the monthly publication of the schools of agricultural and home economics.

The Beaver is edited and managed by members of the junior class. It is a record of student activities for an entire year and is the best memento one can obtain of a year spent at O. A. C.

THE transportation of your merchandise is too important a question to decide lightly. More and more progressive men are finding their logical and entirely satisfactory answer in the Chevrolet One-Ton Truck.

The reason is obvious.

The Chevrolet is made in a big way—big enough to haul all kinds of goods to capacity, do it efficiently, do it consistently day in and day out, and do it as economically as it can be done.
