The flag-ship would not respond to the salutes of her con-sorts. The wind blew northerly at times, but the duke forgot his promise to sail back into the Channel. He thought only of flight, and offered his French pilot two thousand ducats if he should bring him safe to Spain vain; the patient became worse, de-be should bring him safe to Spain. Soon the autumn storms burst, and the Spaniards had to house everything but a rug of sall to steer by. Thick black fogs often settled down upon them, so that they could not see one another's lights at night. One day, however, they had the melancholy satisfaction of capturing a few English pinnaces returning from their fishing-ground laden with cod and ling. This-one almost regrets to say itfleet that was to give Philip the sovereignty over western Europe. It seemed imperative to punish some body for all this disgrace and misery. A number of officers were accused of disobedience or cowardice. Some of these the duke deprived of their commands; and one captain was hanged the elements necessary to give new life in a pinnace, which was sent through and richness to the blood and restore the fleet with its grucesome freight dangling from the yard-arm as a warning to the rest. The weather got ever wilder. The clumsy ships heaved and rolled, and plunged their yards deep into the waves. Hulls got so badly strained that they had to be stiffened with ropes. Strong men flocked to the chap lains, begging for their prayers. Many a poor fellow, losing hope of seeing land again, made his will and intrusted It to the ship's priest. Men sickened and died by hundreds, sons of Spain's noblest houses with the rest. Many ships got so short-handed that they dropped behind the main body, and had to struggle porthward in isolated groups. Now and then a rotten lacing would give way, and the sailors, weak ened by hunger and sickness, had to go aloft in the gale to house the tugging and bellying sail, lucky if shrouds and spars were not slippery and dan-gerous with the driving sleet.
