The Globe office has been brightened and gladdened with beautiful buds and blossoms lately which causes us to forget the usual grime and dust and toil of newspaper life and makes the editor halfway believe that he is young again. 'Tis well for age to have youth near, for while the flowers came to a young and handsome man, the nostrils of the grizzled editor inhale the fragrance, which floats and fills the favored air and calls him back to halcyon days, when all the world was bright and fair and when he used to get flowers for his own. God bless that flower garden. Its brightness is not wasted when sent to grace the place of honor in the Globe office.
