THE PRESIDENT ON TRUSTS

Guarded but significant were the president's utterances yesterday in a speech at Jamestown, New York, in regard to the regulation of trusts. Read between the lines of his printed words, he serves notice not only on the trusts that they must yield to regulation and investigation and must obey the laws, but also on the Republican party that it must sincerely adopt this policy of trust investigation and regulation or yield to a party that will do so.

A main feature of our policy, the president says, should be to secure adequate supervisory and regulative control over all corporations doing an interstate business. This is necessary because some very wealthy corporations "exhaust every effort which can be suggested by the highest ability or secured by the most lavish expenditure of money to defeat the purposes of the laws." Not only the members of such corporations but the business world generally, he says, "ought to realize that such conduct is in every way perilous, and constitutes a menace to the nation generally." Combinations called trusts have produced "unfair restraints of trade of an oppressive character, tending to create great artificial monopolies. The violations of law * * * have more and more become confined to the larger combinations, the very ones against whose policy of monopoly and oppression the law was chiefly directed." The government, the president says, has exercised leniency, but this in such cases as that of the beef trust is no longer possible. And if the trust and other such magnates cannot be reached and punished under present laws, more drastic legislation must be enacted. Since these great corporations "resort to every technical expedient to render enforcement of law impossible," congress "should seek other means for carrying the law into effect." We shall soon have to or ought to "take further action" to control these corporations. The government must "assume a degree of administrative control" of them. The president points out some features of this policy, says, that the benefits enjoyed by the trusts under our laws are "incalculable," and declares that "when, as is now the case, many of the great corporations constantly strain the last resources of legal technicality to avoid obedience to a law for the reasonable regulation of their business, the only way effectively to meet this attitude on their part is to give the executive department of the government a more direct and therefore more efficient supervision and control of their management." Without government restraint "exceptional men use their energies, not in ways that are for the common good, but in ways which tell against this common good; and so doing they not only wrong smaller and less able men—whether wage-workers or small producers and traders—but force other men of exceptional abilities themselves to do what is wrong under penalty of falling behind in the keen race for success. There is need of legislation to strive to meet such abuses." And the president concludes by saying that it "may" be necessary to meet these conditions by "supervision and regulation by the national government of all great corporations doing an interstate business."

This talk will not be pleasing to the trusts, but it will not worry them so much as it will the trust-controlled senators and representatives. On the one hand are their masters, the trusts; on the other that terrible thing, an honest, courageous president, supported by almost all the people. No wonder they dread an early session of congress.—Portland Journal.

A mother in a neighboring village recently went through her ten-year-old boy's pocket one night, says an exchange, and this is the inventory of what she found: Sixteen yards of string, a tobacco tag, a leather shoe string, a paste bottle, four dried angle worms, a clock wheel and spring, three walnuts, a brass breast pin, a piece of porcelain pipe, a pair of scissors, lead pencil, jack-knife, a razor handle, a nail brush, a fish hook, a door bell, half a lower set of teeth, and a piece of paper on which was written: "Mary is 24, is twice as old as an was when Mary was as old as an is now."

The East Oregonian, of Pendleton, is undergoing a boycott from a number of Pendleton business men because it has been making a fight for enforcement of the laws regarding gambling and the saloon business. Funny how quick people will jump on a newspaper with the boycott club if it happens to express an opinion which does not in every particular coincide with their own. The E. O., however, intimates that the boycott may be used both ways and that if certain merchants do not "let up" it will publish their names and let the public generally take a hand in the mixup.

A Condon young lady played a cruel joke on her mother the other day. She accidentally found a love letter that her father had written to her mother in their halcyon days of courtship. She read the letter to her mother, substituting her own name and that of her lover. The mother raved with anger and stamped her foot in disgust and forbade her daughter having anything to do with a man who could write such sickening nonsensical stuff to a girl. The girl then gave the letter to her mother to read and suddenly the house became so quiet she could hear the grass grow in the back yard.

It is said that one member of the city detective force in Portland has "saved" $30,000 within the last few years from a salary of $75 a month. If such a financier had half a show he could put J. D. Rockefeller or J. P. Morgan on the bum in short order.

Public is Aroused.

The public is aroused to a knowledge of the curative merits of that great medicinal tonic, Electric Bitters, for sick stomach, liver and kidneys. Mary H. Walters, of 546 St. Clair Ave., Columbus, O., writes: "For several months, I was given up to die. I had fever and ague, my nerves were wrecked; I could not sleep, and my stomach was also weak, from useless doctors' drugs, that I could not eat. Soon after beginning to take Electric Bitters, I obtained relief, and in a short time I was entirely cured." Guaranteed at all druggists; price 50c.
