L. W. DARLING, Clerk. W. F. ALLEN, Consul Commander

One often hears the remark that the farmer is the most contented man in the world. This is doubtless true of the older generation of farmers but young men who have been reared on the farm are almost invariably cursed with a hatred for the farm life, its hardships and trials. They are usually discontented and long for the busy life of the city, for some occupation which they believe offers greater opportunities for worldly success. They are not old enough to accept their fathers' definition of success. Their fathers believe that the successful man is the one who makes the most of his opportunities. If he be a farmer, let him be a successful farmer; if he be a lawyer, let him be a successful lawyer. It doesn't make any difference what a man is called upon to do, let him do it well, let him make the most of his opportunities. If he does this he will be respected and the world will point to him as a man who has attained success in the field of human endeavor. It requires just as much intelligence to manage a farm successfully as it does to manage a business in the city or to practice a profession. The successful farmer is as much respected by the general public as the successful man in any other walk of life. The man who tills the soil has no doubt a very hard life. He must undergo many physical hardships but the road to success is strewn with boulders. There is no short cut to the goal and the man who is afraid of work is doomed to failure.

Wonder if it ever occurred to the town knocker that it wasn't for his own insignificance the people might possibly pay some attention to the continual sound of his mallet and take up the hue and cry themselves. In that event it wouldn't be a matter of many years before there wouldn't be enough left of the town to support a canary bird. Every time a man knocks the town he knocks himself out of a good many dollars, but its "in 'em" and it's got to come out.
