BIG MONEY IN TURKEYS IS OPINION OF VISITOR

Eastern Oregon is bound to become the great turkey raising section of the Pacific Northwest, in the opinion of an observer who has been in Gilliam and Morrow counties. "They herd turkeys in those prairies just as they used to herd sheep, in great droves," said he "and the birds thrive from the time they are hatched until they are ready for market. One farmer on Willow creek had a band of 500 last fall, and the herder used to take them on to the stubble fields in the morning and drive them back to the corral at night. The turkeys fattened on the scattered grain, and as they did not eat the grass the owner did not care how many turkeys were herded in the field. Finally, just before Thanksgiving, the band were driven to Coyote Station and shipped to Portland. The producer was paid 50 cents a head for the birds and thought he did well, while the same turkeys cost the consumers from $1.50 to $3.00 apiece."

The climate of the Inland Empire is peculiarly adapted to turkeys, being dry and clear for the better part of the year. The birds are allowed to roam over a vast area in search of grain and seeds, but the herder must be on the lookout constantly for coyotes for the animals have discovered that turkey meat is juicy and tender, and they will often take chances on being shot while in quest of a bird for supper. That region used to be devoted to sheep pasture, when the government owned the land, and the range was free. It is all cut up into farms now, and farming has taken the place of wool growing. The turkey does not interfere with the farming.—Observer.

TALKS UPON METHODS OF DRY FARMING

Probably the best institute of its kind ever held in the city of Walla Walla, is the way the Union characterized the meeting held there recently and at which subjects of particular interest and value to those connected with agriculture and stock raising were discussed. Dry land farming occupied a prominent place in the discussions and the following is a synopsis of the address by R. W. Thatcher on the subject: "Methods of Dry Land Farming."

"After your plowing has been completed, use a sub-surface packer. A sub-surface packer is better for the reason that you do not want the top of the soil packed. Follow the packer with a harrow. The whole theory of producing a proper mulch is to follow the plow immediately with the harrow. Better results can be had in this way than any other system.

"The treatment following this is called summer cultivation. Some difficulty is experienced in the use of the spike tooth harrow as it pulverizes.

Whereas the ideal condition of the soil is to have the bottom furrow packed with the top layer left loose.

Successful summer cultivation means keeping weeds from getting too large to cut down by any of the implements used for that purpose.

"After the fall wheat has been seeded, if the soil has been properly handled, there will be a good fall growth. I think there are distinct values in cultivating wheat in the fall. Also, the more wheat is cultivated in the spring the better the soil will retain more moisture for the growing period.

"Wherever there is 15 inches of rainfall, two crops may be raised on the land. It seems a great pity that the land should lie idle every other year.

"There is a very distinct advantage in dry land farming to have the rainfall come during the season in which it comes in this country. When the rainfall comes in the summer it passes out of the ground by evaporation and the land does not receive the amount of benefit that it does otherwise."

City Election at Arlington.
