Head curator Tiffany Boothe examines and dissects the squid with aquarium staff.

BIG SQUID!

Cannon Beach Gazette

After visitors to Silver Point reported a 10-foot robust squid on July 27, the Seaside Aquarium responded.

Aquarium staff took a unique opportunity to examine and dissect the 90-pound squid, which had a mantle length of 4 feet. Found on the eastern Pacific, the species ranges from Alaska to California. They are also found off the coast of Japan.

Aquarium staff reported the squid had been dead for “a little while” and some scavenging had occurred. “But all in all, it was in pretty good shape,” the aquarium’s Tiffany Boothe said. “Most likely this animal died after spawning and ocean currents brought it ashore.”

The robust clubhook squid, Onykia robusta, is the third largest squid species in the world, and can reach a total length of 12 feet.

Two larger species are the colossal squid and the giant squid, both of which exceed lengths of 30 feet.

Oregon has marijuana oversupply

PORTLAND — Two of the first states to broadly legalize marijuana took different approaches to regulation that left Oregon with a vast oversupply and Colorado with a well-balanced market. But in both states prices for bud have plummeted.

A new Oregon report by law enforcement found nearly 70 percent of the legal recreational marijuana grown goes unsold, while an unrelated state-commissioned Colorado study found most growers there are planting less than half of their legal allotment — and still meeting demand.

The reports offer case studies for California and other pot-friendly states as they ramp up their legal pot industries. They also underscore some key differences in how broad legalization was handled that have helped shape differently evolving markets in each state.

The Oregon study released by the Oregon-Idaho High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area — a coalition of local, state and federal agencies — includes the medical and general-use markets and the illegal market, despite gaps in data on illicit marijuana grows.

It noted Oregon still has a serious problem with out-of-state trafficking and black market grows — and the top federal law enforcement officer in Oregon demanded more cooperation from state and local officials Aug. 2 in a strident statement.

“What is often lost in this discussion is the link between marijuana and serious, interstate criminal activity. Overproduction is rampant, and the illegal transport of product out-of-state — a violation of both state and federal law — continues unchecked,” said Billy Williams, U.S. attorney for Oregon. “It’s time for the state to wake up, slow down and address these issues in a responsible and thoughtful manner.”
