JOB DEPARTMENT

My Job Department is complete in every respect and I am able to do all kinds Commercial Job Printing on short notice at reasonable prices.

FRIDAY, JULY 19, 1912.

One who is not worried over the outcome of election is Hon. White-law Reed, ambassador to England, who has been trying his best to lose his job.

If you have six cents more now than one year ago you have kept up with the prosperity procession. The treasury department's figures show that the per capita circulation is now $34.26, which is a gain of six cents over last year.

Take it for what it is worth. We are advised that at the north pole the thermometer went up to zero during the recent hot spell and caused much suffering. All the igloos were shimmering in the torrid glare, and heat waves made an inferno of the ice fields. Several Eskimos died of sunstroke. The seals and walrus lay panting on the floes. Children, driven to desperation, were breaking holes in the ice and taking baths.

HIT THE NAIL ON THE HEAD.

The gentleman under discussion was a judge upon the bench. One thought that he was not at all well read in law—learned in the law as the attorneys say—as some other judge. Another of the party thought he was not as industrious as a judge might be and still not suffer from paresis. Still another believed that his education was not as classic as it could have been, had the gentleman under discussion taken advantage of all of his opportunities.

Then spake a member of the bar, a man of long practice before the courts, thoroughly learned in the law himself and a successful practitioner from every standpoint. "Gentlemen," he began, "I have listened patiently to what you have said of the judge. If he is honest, your remarks concerning his other qualifications are idle words. Give me an honest judge;

I will then win or lose my case as I deserve to win or lose."

Discussion ceased as there was no question of the honesty of the judge who was being discussed. It required no further argument to convince the little gathering that it had made a mistake in entering upon the considering of an honest man; that where honesty is ability abounds; that where an honest man sits upon the bench, the law books may be closed and no one suffer; that honesty is the supreme test of a man's fitness to pass upon the contentions of his fellows. For he who hesitates a moment must know that the law is founded upon honesty and that only an honest man can therefore be trusted to interpret the law.

A GOOD CHEER SOCIETY

The daughter of a certain lumberman has founded a new society which she is pleased to call the Good Cheer society. She is devoting her time and money to promoting the organization and has traveled to many places, establishing branches of the society.

The requirements of the members are simple. All one has to do to join the organization is to sign a pledge to be of good cheer, and to promote cheerfulness—as simple a proposition as was ever put up to mortal man.

Now, the organization of the society may be a fad with the young woman. It may be that she is spending her father's money traveling around talking about good cheer only because she wants the notoriety. It makes no difference about that. The point is that this young woman is doing a world of good, regardless of why she is doing it, and despite the fact the society may perish from the earth at an early date.

Cheerfulness is a mental process. All that is necessary to promote it is to mention it. The most crabbed individual on earth straightens up and becomes cheerful if any one mentions it to him; he is ashamed to admit that he is not always cheerful. So the fact that the young woman goes into lumber camps and the mines and mentions cheerfulness is worth a whole lot to the world.

Then, the newspapers cannot mention the society without reminding everyone who reads the item of the value of being cheerful, without spreading a contagion, in fact that runs on to the end of time. Have not you who have read this prosy comment already resolved in your mind that you will be more cheerful in the future? That is the way the contagion works.
