OODLES, THE AVENGER

Without another word or look he turned toward the blue hills. Soon he disappeared in the scrub at the end of the street.

When the village had been shut off by tag alders and bushes Oodles' long strides shortened. Unconsciously he came to a standstill. He stood for several minutes in an indecision that was painful. His lips moved soundlessly.

Evidently it was a time of intense mental agitation, for the sweat burst out on his forehead, and his hands clinched until the knuckles showed white through the brown skin, and the tendons in his wrists drew like cords.

At last a resolution was reached. Heading west, he began to run swiftly, but with great caution.

He slipped through the brush like a wild thing. His face took on a new expression—queer and terrible.

As he ran he bore to the north in a half circle. Presently he came out on a little knoll, threw himself flat in the long grass and peered between the trunks of a clump of jack pines.

Yes, there they stood on the bank of the river, near the rapids. The lawyer, his face alight, was pointing as he explained the plans of his company to Therese.

The girl was looking up at her companion. Even at that distance the half wit read the unconscious pathos of her attitude.

With swift fierceness he drew the rifle to his shoulder, sighted carefully and fired.

Amidon paused in the midst of his sentence, blank amazement on his face. Then he tottered and fell.

Therese's scream echoed high above the bur of the rapids. The half wit ran away, more like a wild thing than ever.

Therese and her lover, who was also her husband, stood on the porch of the Lecoeur house in the gloaming. Her dark eyes were pools of brooding happiness.

The man, mimicking a shy school-boy, edged over and took her hand. She laughed and leaned against him.

"It's good to be here," he said.

"Do you know what day it is?"

He looked down at her, eyes round with recollection.

"By Jove!" he cried. "It's just a year—a year ago today."

She nodded. They were silent a moment, and then he went on:

"If it hadn't been for that I'd never have discovered how much I cared. I was going away without a word to you. Think of that!"

"But you hadn't finished binding me up before I was crazy about you, and the longer you nursed me the more I loved you."

His arm went round her. She nestled against him and sighed contentedly.

"The chap who did it was a marksman," he continued. "There I was, gesticulating like Mark Antony, and along comes a bullet and breaks my arm snip like that. I wonder who it was?"

"I'd like to know so I could thank him. The fellow did me a good turn." She shuddered a little.

"I was frightened—at first. But it did come out all right, didn't it?"

"It certainly did," returned Amidon. "And now let's talk of something more serious. Kiss me," he said severely.

A chuckle came from the doorway behind, and they turned guiltily, like children.

"Oh," said Therese, relieved, "it's only Oodles!"
