HOW TO KEEP THE BOYS ON THE FARM.

If you want to keep your boy on the farm, take him to the city.

You cannot persuade the boy that the best place for him is on the farm, so don't try it.

Try him out by giving him an interest in the farm earnings. Don't make the drudgery alone exclusively his.

Don't keep the boy away from the city, thinking that if he knows nothing of city life he will not want it. This is one of the common mistakes too often made.

Take him to the city; take him to the theaters and to the workshops. Let him see the fullness of all the enjoyments of a city. Point out to him the other side. Let him see for himself that there is more and harder drudgery in the city than in the country. Show him the luxurious, well-kept offices of the men of affairs and also the headquarters of the common laborer (with all due respects for the latter) but as an example it suffices. The boy will see without being told that he cannot occupy one of the offices without fitting himself for the position. He will also notice that fairly good positions are not yawning for takers. He will also discover that he cannot spend any amount of his time with the amusements the city affords.

Let him wander through the streets where the beautiful homes of the rich adorn the handsomely paved thoroughfares, and too, let him view the alleys and by-ways where the poor reside.

Education—practical and personal, is what the boy needs. He needs to know just where he must start in when he decides to shift from farm to city life.

If, after he has familiarized himself with all the conditions of city life, he decides the city is where he wants to take his chances for success, the sooner he makes the start the better. He will be a misfit on the farm, a tragedy of life too frequently witnessed by fathers and mothers.

VIOLENCE VERSUS LAW AND ORDER.

Two steamerloads of the I. W. W. agitators and organization went to Everett, Washington, to assist the striking shingle weavers break down open shop sentiment and in resisting their landing the sheriff was shot, six killed and many wounded.

When there is a contest in the United States between violence on the one side and law and order on the other, the latter always prevails. Blood may be shed in the struggle, but the outcome is law and order.

As a people we believe in the rule of law, we believe in a government of law to which all men, high and low, rich and poor, are alike subject, so that when there is a challenge, such as that at Everett, it is promptly met by citizens.

The I. W. W., if one may judge by utterances and acts of members, believe violence is necessary to gain ends sought. They have asserted the need of violence as a reform agency. They have intense grudges against what they call the employer class.

They differ from most of the socialists. The dominant element of socialists favors political action in contrast with direct action. The dominant element believes in bringing about changes in government through the ballot and official action. The I. W. W. believes in stirring things up by a challenge of orderly processes, this is called "direct action," while political action is regarded as indirect.

The government of the United States is one of political action. It may be changed by a vote of the people. When an effort is made to change in any other way, Americans, with few exceptions, rally for law and order and offer their lives for that principle.

It is difficult to imagine anything of value that can be gained by the course of the I. W. W. No city, no community, will permit the overriding of law by violent procedure, for to remove the life and property safeguards we all enjoy.
