Letter From E. L. McCabe.

Camp Merritt, N. J., March 18, 1918.

Dear Friend:

Your letter received to-day at the above named place. We arrived here last night after being on the road nearly three weeks. We had some trip.

We took a transport at San Francisco, the transport being the Northern Pacific. Took the train at Fort Stevens, had a fine trip to San Francisco. The weather was good all the way. Going through Oregon we had quite a turnout at all the stations at all the towns we went through at night. Arrived in Portland at one A. M. There was a large crowd there to see us off. Saw my father when I went through. Portland was really the only place we were allowed to get off.

At Roseburg we got off for exercise, did double time around the block, then back to the train in formation. The next stop for a hike was in Ashland.

In California all the fruit trees were in bloom. We made an eight hour stop at a town called Tracy. This stop, I think was to kill time, as they were not ready for us at Frisco. Tracy is a town about the size of Tillamook.

Well we arrived in San Francisco the next morning after leaving Tracy, I forgot to mention that they gave us a dance at Tracy. I did not go as I had to go on guard, but it was so crowded they could hardly dance so I guess I did not miss much.

On arriving at San Francisco we hiked straight to the dock and went aboard the boat. We lived on board boat tied up to the dock for two days and could not get off any of this time to take in Frisco.

Had a fine trip down the coast to the Panama canal. The ocean was very smooth all the way but it was very tropical. The trip through the canal was the most interesting of the whole trip. Made a short stop at Colon but as usual was not allowed any shore leave. This not being able to go ashore at the different stops was disappointing, but of course the officials did not want to advertise the fact that a transport was going through with a load of soldiers.

After leaving Colon and getting out in the Atlantic ocean it became considerable rougher and a good many were seasick. I was not sick any of the time.

Our next stop was at Norfolk, Va. Stayed about half a day at this port. Took a hike here of a mile or two. Did not see anything of the town as we hiked along the outskirts. Must have been the negro district as about all we saw was coons.

Our next stop was at Hoboken N. J. From there we took the train to here. We will probably be here for four or five days. We are only about fourteen miles from New York. I expect to be able to take in New York one of these nights as they are giving so many passes each night. I also saw the Statue of Liberty.

Arba was on the same boat with us. He is going to Aberdeen, Scotland. I lost a good deal of flesh on the trip but am feeling fine.
