A woman issued forth.

He was young, but not as young as an idle gams might conjecture in a place where reason was not in evidence. He appeared to be in the early twenyes, but more in line with his years. He had no beard, no mustache, not a hint of a smile. He was not even particularly well-dressed. In fact, he looked like any other man on the street. There was the usual sort of characteristic that distinguishes men from women. The characteristic appeared only in his eyes. He was not particularly tall, but he had a certain grace about him that made him stand out. His face was smooth, and he had a calm, pensive expression.

What was to do with one who had both men and women, and who did not know how to distinguish between the two? His eyes were not particularly keen, and he had difficulty seeing clearly. He was not interested in the appearance of others, and he never bothered to look at them. He was never particular about what he wore, and he was content to go about in a simple, unassuming manner.

'There was no need to be particular about what one wore, and there was no need to be concerned with what others thought of one. One was what one was, and that was all that mattered.'

The woman was not ready for him. She had not expected to see him. She had been walking along the street, lost in thought, when she saw him. He was standing there, staring at her, with a strange, intense look in his eyes. She was startled, but she did not feel threatened. She did not know what to do, and she did not know what to say.

"What are you doing here?" she asked, in a voice that was not particularly loud, but that seemed to carry a certain weight. She was not sure what to expect, and she was not sure what to do.

"I am here because I was told to be here," he replied, in a voice that was not particularly loud, but that seemed to carry a certain weight. He was not sure what to expect, and he was not sure what to do.

She was taken aback. She had never seen anyone like him before. She did not know what to do, and she did not know what to say.
