Mr. Consumer: There is several non-add merchants in the valley. Why? Are they afraid their goods wont stand the "spot-light" or do they wish to kill home industry by non-support. A merchants add is his best recommendation. Make him show good credentials

ting your share you should, E. & W. CHANDLER (Adv.)

It has not been definitely settled upon, but the plans are well under way for Eagle Valley's Harvest Home to be held again this year, the principal business men of Richland having announced that they are in favor of it. It will be pleasing news for Baker people to know that there is likelihood of the Harvest Home being held, many of them will be on hand to take part in the celebration of it.

THE HELPFUL WAY

By CHESTER FARRINGTON.

Presently he grinned. He rang the bell into the outer office. A brisk clerk answered the summons.

"Riley," said Trevor. "Did you ever think you'd like to have your voice manicured?" he asked.

"I hadn't thought much about it," Riley confessed.

"Well, do so now. As a favor to me, will you take piano lessons if I'll stand the bills?"

"Sure. That'll be all right," said Riley. "When do I begin?"

"Tomorrow. I'll tell you the place to go to then. Send in Emmons when you go out, will you?"

So Emmons came in, and Emmons was inveigled into taking vocal lessons. After that the entire office force, one after another, came in at his behest and each one was urged (and proved willing) to take lessons either for the voice or on the piano. Two weeks later Sam Trevor again pretended to have business in the Weymouth building. Again he dropped into Marlon Heath's office. It had a much more spruce appearance.

Marlon, too, was her old smiling self.

"You can't stay long," said she. "I have two little girls named Todd coming for their lessons at 3:30. I'm wonderfully busy these days. I'd be ashamed to tell you how many pupils I have."

"Good enough!" said Sam. "You might have known you'd succeed in anything you undertook."

"They started coming last week," said she. "And after the ice was broken they simply seemed to come in droves. Ah, here are the little Todd girls now. You'll have to run along."

Sam was smiling in pleased fashion to himself when he took the elevator down that afternoon. He continued to smile for two whole days. Then suddenly that smile vanished. Emmons came in with the residue of the money Sam had given him for a quarter's vocal lessons.

"Sorry, Mr. Trevor," said he. "I can't take any more, it seems. Miss Heath said today it was simply a waste of money."

And after Emmons came Riley with a very similar plaint, and after Riley the rest of the office force.

Twenty minutes later Trevor was in that room in the Weymouth building.

Marlon met him firmly.

"I found out my pupils were simply your office force," said she, "and that you were paying for the lessons. I simply couldn't do anything else but send them away, Sam. It was perfectly fine and splendid of you to do anything like that, but I really couldn't take the money."

"Well, you'll take something else, then."

"What is it?"

"You'll take me. Stop all this nonsense and marry me."

She turned away. She looked out at the white walls of the light shaft.

"Would you send 'em all back if I didn't?"

"Yes, and some of the hands from the factory for good measure."

"Then," said she, faintly, "in self-defense—"

"I don't care what excuse you give," said Sam, striding forward joyfully and taking her in his arms.
