THE EMPIRE'S VINEYARD

Asset Worth Millions to New South Wales

New South Wales has been aptly called "The Empire's Vineyard" on account of the wonderful vine-covered slopes dotted about the various portions of the State which have attained unfailing successes, and which have been the means of bringing prosperity to so many fortunate settlers.

So far only a very small portion of the vineyard has been exploited, but one district stands out in the full bloom of success as a glowing example of the State's potentialities in that direction.

That district is the Hunter River Valley, about 150 miles north from Sydney, where many of the vineyards have been in the possession of the same families for three generations, and where the State Minister for Lands in his laudable policy of giving the soldier his best chance of making good, has decided to settle 200 returned men in wine-growing.

Vignerons are notably a fine type of people and this certainly applies to the Hunter River growers and their families. There big families are reared comfortably and happily among the picturesque vineyards. One grower, who has a very large and flourishing vineyard, does not need to employ any labor outside his own family circle.

Another settler whose vineyards and cellars are among the "shows" of the district is a man well on in years who has found wine-growing a safe and profitable harborage after years of struggling. Up till ten years ago he went through all the battling and endeavor that is the lot of so many men faced with the task of rearing a large family on a small area, for he had ten children.

The farm was not sufficient and there was the usual dependence upon contracting and other work away from home. Then this settler managed to enter the ranks of the wine-growers and from then on his life story was a brighter one. He now has 74 acres under vines and they amply support him and seven of his sons, two of whom are married, and he has to employ a fair amount of outside labor during the picking season.

These 74 acres furnish a fine proof of the closer settlement capabilities of vine growing, for the same land devoted to any other land industry could not give such satisfactory results.

This settler says that there has never been a total failure any year as with other crops, and the normal yield in the Hunter River district is put down at from two to three tons per acre.

At present wine-growers are being paid from $43 to $53 per ton, as the supply will not meet the demand, and if New South Wales is to benefit by the magnificent export trades now offering, the area under vines must be increased a hundredfold.

Great Britain imports 12,000,000 gallons of wine per annum; the yearly consumption of wine in the East is 30,000,000. These two markets are waiting for Australian wines, and it is to be expected that future British tariffs will provide for preference within the Empire.

Australia is the nearest wine-growing country to the East, and a market for its wines was found there during the war. In pre-war days Germany, France and California supplied that market.

But quality counts with wine; price is not the main thing. For instance, Noumea, in New Caledonia, is a small place but its population is largely French and it consumes about 1,000,000 gallons of wine a year. Recently a Sydney firm had an order from Noumea for 2,000 hogsheads of wine for four years—120,000 gallons a year—at $1.10 per gallon. Owing to the limited supply and the rich prospects of the trade, the offer could not be accepted.

Australian wine has established a favorable name in London and one factor in making that reputation was that the medical men of Great Britain recommended it widely.

No rural industry offers better promise at the present time. Where other industries are troubled as to the future—needlessly or otherwise—the wine grower has the guarantee of a definite price for the next ten years at least.

It is estimated that there are upwards of eighty millions of dollars invested in the wine-growing industry in Australia and many millions of dollars are waiting to be made out of the yet untitled portion of the Empire's Vineyard in this sunlit section of the Continent.
