EXPERIMENT STATION

Continued from page one. and the crop will be about as good, judging from the experiments. Packing or immediate harrowing are unnecessary. If the ground be plowed late and dry no amount of cultivation is of any avail.

The experiment to determine the difference between plowing and discing does not show much advantage in favor of the plowing, but it is only fair to state that discing on the station is discing in the best sense of the word.

A rather extensive experiment is being conducted in crop rotations. Some ground has grown peas for twenty years, some corn, fallow and wheat, some one thing and some another in an attempt to build up the nitrogen content of the soil. This winter tests were made of this soil for the first time in eleven years and they showed that soil nitrogen had decreased in every plot. A comparison between virgin soil and crop soil shows that the nitrogen is much lower than it was years ago. Mr. Stephens states that when the nitrogen is reduced to a certain point it tends to remain there and it is very hard to increase it. Some additional yields may be obtained by the use of appropriate fertilizer.

A varietal experiment of spring wheats accidentally gives a good example of drought damage. The Federation wheat in this experiment was injured very slightly while some of the wheats have a half of the heads white and barren. It was explained that if drought occurs as the heads are coming out of the boot the sheath is likely to become dried and contract holding the top of the head until the upper meshes are broken and do not produce kernels. This causes many of the spots that look can" farm where wheat is grown in cans with sufficient moisture, indicate that the best method of disposing of straw and stubble is to return it to the soil. Ground on which the stubble and straw is burned produced 23.4 bushels and ground on which the total straw was plowed under produced 25.7 bushels during a ten year period. Manured ground is often a better yielder than either of the above.

An experiment is being conducted to find the best grass for this county. So far Crested Wheat is the best that has been developed and it is being used on the thinner land on the station and is also being grown on land that is subject to erosion with satisfactory results. A new brome grass looks good and will be developed. Grasses may play an important part in this county as it may be necessary to sow grasses on much of the land abandoned under the new federal crop reduction plan and it is probably true that several thousand acres would be more productive in grass than in wheat.

The development of trees is a sideline on the station and varieties adaptable to the county are being grown. A few western Yellow Pine trees make an excellent windbreak and can be grown in eight or ten years. Russian olive is drought resistant and grows well in all parts of this district. A little cultivation and some attention the first few years are all that is required to grow trees satisfactorily in this county.
