and Lane county citizens have been hard at work on the event. In addition to the 2000 cast members, a number equal to this have been aiding in various ways. Even men not directly connected with the pageant have been wearing old time whiskers and costumes, while women of the city have appeared on the streets clad in quaint and charming pioneer costumes.

The Oregon Trail will again have three feature events, in addition to a lively program of lesser attractions. The pageant will be held each night, while on Friday the pioneer parade will take place, and on Saturday practically every city in the state will join in for the parade of progress.

As a grand finale and thrilling climax to the pageant, the spirit of modern youth is shown, in all its seeming madness. In the midst of this scene steps the spirit of the pioneer, commanding all to hark back to the standards and ideals of those who made the Oregon country a land of beauty and history.

Poultrymen Plan Disease Control

Oregon poultrymen have decided to wage a determined fight if necessary, first to get federal assistance in the working out of control of the disease coccidiosis, and then to convince state and national authorities of the importance of the poultry industry entitling it to more consideration in research and other governmental programs.

This was decided at the eleventh annual convention just held at Oregon State college where a plan was laid and money appropriated to this end by the Oregon Poultrymen's association which holds its annual meeting each year in connection with the convention.

Fred H. Cockell of Milwaukee reported on the progress so far toward getting a federal appropriation to center a national research project in coccidiosis control here in Oregon with Dr. W. T. Johnson poultry pathologist in charge. He said he finds that Dr. Johnson is undoubtedly the outstanding authority in the country on this national problem, but that with the discontinuance of the fund for this work the research is lagging.

Prospects are good for better price conditions for the coming six months or a year in eastern markets according to H. E. Shackleton assistant general manager of the Pacific Egg Producers of New York, the sales agency shipping west coast eggs even through the several cooperative concerns. He said western growers can maintain or even increase their favorable differential over eastern products if they will keep one jump ahead in their breeding
