

Tick Bites Held Serious For Men

What To Do When The Ticks Bite Told By Relief Agency Of Oregon

For general distribution, particularly eastern Oregon, the State Relief Committee has issued warnings to all relief project managers and superintendents to guard against any appearance of what is known as Rocky Mountain spotted fever, also known as tick-fever, following word received from Harney county that two deaths have occurred near Burns, and that two cases are under treatment in Jefferson county, though none of the cases are SERA employees.

Warning bulletins have been sent to all counties of the state, particularly emphasized East of the Cascades, the most dangerous time being in the spring and early summer up to the middle of July. The safety department of the State Relief Committee, in its bulletin urges immediate calling of a physician in all known cases. Describing the ticks as "hatching from eggs and first feeding on small rodents, squirrels, gray-diggers, mice, etc. then they drop off and molt, later attaching themselves to larger mammals such as rabbits, dogs, and sheep, until they are again fed with blood. Again they drop off and molt. During the first stage they have only six legs. The final stage is the adult having eight legs. The female is the dangerous insect, as the male is not known to attack human beings.

"The adult female is over 1-8 inch long, of reddish-brown color, with a white shield extending from the head to the middle of the back. The male has a pattern of white and brown stripes and dashes over the entire back. When unfed they are flat, but when gorged with blood they are larger than a coffee bean.

"Persons walking through grass, brush, or weeds contact the unfed ticks which grasp the clothing or skin and search for a good place to feed. If not discovered and removed, danger of contracting tick fever exists.

"If ticks fasten themselves do not pull them out violently, as the mouth-parts sometimes remain embedded and cause ulcers and infection. But apply a drop of turpentine, gasoline, or creolin to the tick and she usually will let go in a few minutes. After removing the tick disinfect the bite with iodine, diluted lysol or diluted carbolic acid."
