Drying of Fruits And Vegetables Good Practice

A supply of dried fruits and vegetables in addition to the canned ones not only offers a greater variety in the winter menu but saves expense for jars and labor in canning, says Miss Lucy A. Case, extension specialist in foods and nutrition at Oregon State college.

Almost any food can be preserved by drying. Miss Case points out, but of course some are much more delicious than others. Dried corn is a favorite with many people, some of whom prefer it to canned corn. Dried pears, apples, prunes, peaches and apricots can be re-hydrated or "soaked up" and made into sauce, pies, fruit cobblers and filling for upside-down cakes, or used in various ways.

Some people, says Miss Case, have a special liking for dried berries in spite of the seeds, and use them in pudding sauces, cookies and for flavoring many other foods. Even tomatoes can be cooked down and dried in a sheet and furnish excellent flavoring for stews, soups, macaroni, and other dishes. Although so much exposure to the air probably destroys the much-boasted vitamin content of the tomato, the minerals in dried products are much more concentrated. Miss Case says. Dried fruits rank high in iron content, she says.

The hot summer sunshine, the heat from a stove, or a rapid current of air furnished by a fan may be used for drying foods, says Miss Case. The color of green vegetables or other products that oxidize readily is improved by blanching them in boiling water for 2 to 5 minutes before drying. Most fruits or vegetables are peeled and sliced or cubed to facilitate drying, and then placed in thin layers or racks, trays or plates. The most desirable drying temperature is from 140 to 150 degrees Fahrenheit.

Drying time varies with the thickness and texture of the product. Dried fruits should be leathery and pliable, and dried vegetables brittle but not baked or scorched. To test a drying product, break it into at the thickest part. If no moisture can be squeezed from the broken end it is sufficiently dry. It is then conditioned for three days, reheated and sealed in paper bags or boxes, to exclude insects. It is well to examine and reheat them every few months.

Directions for constructing a homemade drier, and detailed directions for drying, conditioning and storing 16 different fruits and vegetables are contained in Extension bulletin 479, "Home Food Preservation," which may be had free
