Crop Reports Show Loss To Canadian Crop

Rust C ts US Yield Below Early Estimates

Crop developments were again an important influence in the wheat situation. Threshing returns from the spring wheat area substantiated earlier estimates of heavy damage from rust and heat with indications that final outturns might be below the August first official estimate. Serious damage to the Canadian spring wheat crop was confirmed by the official report which placed the condition of the crop August 1, at 81% of the long time average. This condition suggests average yields of 13.6 bushels per acre and on the basis of the estimated acreage would give a harvest about 50,000,000 bushels over the 1934 harvest. Further deterioration since the first of August is indicated by the report from the Manitoba Free Press which shows severe and widespread damage with approximately 7,000,000 acres in Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan affected by rust. Excellent conditions however, still prevailed in other sections of Saskatchewan and in central and northern sections of Alberta. Alberta crops however, are late and frost damage is feared since two or more degrees of frost have already occurred at several points in that province.

Rapid deterioration of the wheat crop during July and early August brings total prospective supplies and trade requirements more prominently into the situation. Preliminary estimates of wheat stocks suggest a reduction of some 300,000,000 bushels in world stocks as of August 1, compared with a year ago. United States and Canadian stocks, including bonded grain are 124,226,000 bushels below those of last season. Argentine supplies available for export and carryover are around 32,000,000 bushels less than last season while Australian holdings are about 30,521,000 bushels under those of a year ago. Stocks of grain on ocean passage are the lowest since the war period and totaled 17,000,000 bushels August 1, or only a little more than half those of a year earlier.

HI-WAYS TO HEALTH

Cookies were never more popular than they are today and the traditional cookie jar is still a center of interest for old and young alike. Children enjoy cookies because they make such a delightful accompaniment for that inevitable glass of milk. Mothers appreciate them for their convenience in meal planning. Cookies served with a frozen dessert or fruit will make the simplest meal a complete success.

The modern cookie is a product of the present day trends in home making and the new conceptions of an adequate diet. The enlightened homemaker is not content with spending tedious hours rolling out the old style cookie of only fat, sugar and flour. Cookies in the modern family dietary must include definite food values such as vitamins and minerals. These values may be incorporated in cookies by the use of butter, dried fruit, molasses and whole grain cereals. Butter not only adds to the food value but gives a natural flavor to the cookie which cannot be imitated. The low melting point of butter as compared with other fats is favorable to ease and completeness of digestion.

Success in cookie baking lies in good ingredients, accurate measurements, correct mixing and proper baking. The perfect cookie should be light, tender, delicate and moist, evenly risen without cracks, and lightly and evenly browned. Crispness will depend upon the type of cookie baked. The flavor should be characteristically pleasing and mellow.

Cookies are not only healthier than the more elaborate cakes and pastries but are highly economical and deserve a prominent place in every family dietary. The following cookie recipes are favorites and would be suitable for any occasion.
