Accumulated Funds Helped Fair This Year

County Budget Called Upon to Defray Expenses Next Year

A. H. Barnum, president of the county fair board, appeared before the county budget committee Saturday and explained why the fair would need a bigger appropriation this year than in former years. The fair this year was the first held in four years. During the years there was no fair the millage and race funds accumulated to the extent that they were able to take care of a big expense of the fair that was held this year. Next year the fair board will not have those big funds at their disposal, so the shortage will have to be covered by an appropriation from the county fund.

Painting of the buildings and other repairs made this year depleted the treasury. Now that the buildings are in good shape the board has employed a watchman—Bert Cox—to see that they are kept in repair. The gate receipts this year just about took care of the cost of the entertainment program, which totaled over eleven hundred dollars.

The meeting of the county fair board, which was to have been held Saturday, was postponed to some future date, for the reason that other meetings conflicted. The time of the postponed meeting will be announced later.

And Then Some Men Say Fair Sex Lack Initiative

At a meeting of the county budget committee Saturday afternoon at a time when the first blasts of winter were rattling the windows in the county building, Miss Viola Hansen tiptoed to the automatic control and turned on the heat. In a very short time the room was comfortable. At another critical time in the proceedings of the committee, Mrs. Peetz, who as county assessor had occupied a seat at the end of the table, brought in a supply of ash trays and distributed one to each individual at the table.

And yet there are men who profess to believe that there is no place in public activities for members of the fair sex.

Importance Of Weed Control In This County Stressed

Prof. Chas. Smith of Oregon State college, Corvallis, appeared before the county budget committee Saturday and stressed the importance of weed control in this section. He stated that the farmers should not become lax in exterminating the weeds, for once started in a summer fallow country, the cost of keeping them down grows more and more. Mr. Smith was speaking in favor of adding $50 to the budget for the office of county agent.

Oregon Land Being Investigated For Resettlement

Only Land With Proven Production Will Be Bought

Good farm land is now being investigated, appraised and optioned in many parts of Oregon to be used for resettlement of farm families now on unprofitable land. Young farm couples trying to establish a farm, tenant farmers desiring ownership and rehabilitation clients approved for resettlement, announces W.B. Tucker, regional resettlement head, Portland.

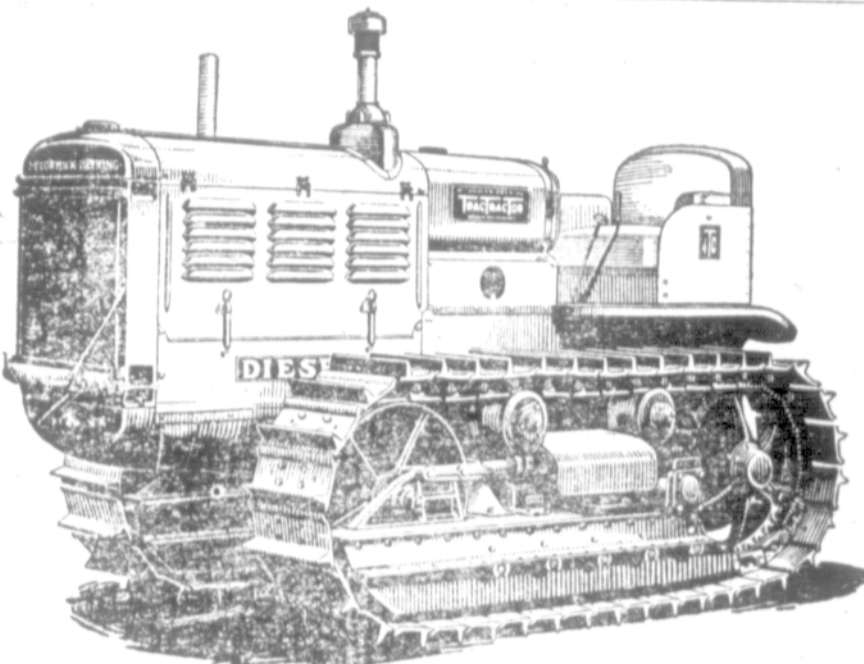

Only farming land with a proven production and good soil will be considered and the price of the land must not exceed what is normally being paid in the community emphasized Tucker. Speculators and land owners asking prices above fair appraisals in areas where resettlement projects are contemplated will only force abandonment of the program in these regions and cause transfer to some other district.

Farmers and land owners having desirable land for sale were warned not to give credence to real estate agents laying claims to special influence with the federal government in selling a client's land for resettlement.

"All individuals having good land for sale can deal directly with the government through the nearest resettlement officials and need not go through a real estate agency as intermediary," said Tucker. "While the government will purchase land from real estate agencies where the price is fair, no land agency will be given preference or special considerations over individual owners."

"Optioning of land for resettlement does not supply a guarantee that the land will be purchased, but indicates the land involved is being considered for resettlement and will be purchased if a project can be set up in that particular area."
