Does all the horse killing farm work

Ridgefield, Washington.

Gentlemen: The farm I am working belongs to Dr. Goffin and lies along the bank of Salmon River in Clark county, Washington. We grow prunes, walnuts and filberts and the orchards are planted on very steep ground. For many years we tried to work the place with a wheel tractor after finding that it was a horse killer. There were spots that were so steep that we let them go back to brush rather than try to cultivate them. In other places we worked around the trees by hand and the whole orchard was badly terraced. Truthfully both Dr. Goffin and myself didn't believe any tractor could work the place satisfactorily. One day after much selling effort on the part of the salesman and somewhat against our wishes, he brought a "Caterpillar" tractor on the place to show us what it would do. That was several years ago but the tractor is still with us. There is no finer nor better worked orchard in this part of the country. The tractor has stood the gaff and is in excellent shape. It works for a lot less money than the old tractor and really does the job. Our tillage is done in a few days out of each month while with the old outfit it was never done. The salesman who sold this "Caterpillar" has my undying gratitude. Yours truly,
GOFFIN RANCH

SURE TRACTION to take your farm tools most anywhere at any season and in any soil. "Caterpillar" traction means fast, sure, timely field work. DEPENDABILITY is the natural result of painstaking heat treatment, machining, assembling and material selection. "Caterpillar" not only performs better, but they keep it up, year after year.

Feeding Experiment

Ability of beef cattle to put on good gains despite severe winter weather was demonstrated here during January by the results obtained at the Livestock Branch Experiment station at Union. Four out of the seven lots of steers fed made an average gain of more than two pounds per day during the month, a figure considered good under normal conditions.

These feeding trials were carried on under practical commercial conditions, reports D. E. Richards, superintendent, as the steers were fed in open lots with only a wind-break for shelter.

Cattle fed alfalfa hay and coarsely ground barley made the best gains for the month, averaging 2.23 pounds per day. A comparable lot of steers fed grain hay and barley made only an average gain of 1.91 pounds. Gains made by heifers were considerably less than those by the steers. Good Hereford cattle were used in all the trials.

Considerable interest in finishing cattle has developed in Oregon in the past few years as the demand for better quality beef has grown. A series of feed resources meetings were held through the livestock sections of the state this winter to make available recent experimental results with stock feeding. Because of the unusually severe winter weather the January record is considered particularly encouraging.

"John" asked the nagging wife, as they prepared to retire for the night, "is everything shut up?" "That depends upon you," growled John, "everything else is."

Wheat Market Makes Gains In February

Domestic wheat markets made further substantial gains during the second week in February, influenced by advances in foreign markets and rapidly diminishing stocks of domestic grain, according to the Weekly Grain Market Review of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics. Spring wheats were up 3c to 5c per bushel and winter wheat gained 1c to 2c with heavy weight grain in best request. Feed grains were steady with only a moderate inquiry for current offerings. Unfavorable returns from feeding at prevailing prices of feed grains, livestock, dairy and poultry products, together with approaching spring pasturage in Southern areas, were principally responsible for the slow demand for corn and oats and the substitution of roughages and lower priced feeds. Maltng barley continued in good request at steady prices. Flax gained about 1c per bushel reflecting higher quotations on Argentine seed.

An active European inquiry for foreign grain continued the outstanding feature in the wheat situation. Germany purchased large quantities of Czechoslovakian and Argentine wheat, according to trade reports, while Spain took a cargo each of Danubian and Australian grain. Inquiry from English millers slackened in expectation of large arrivals of Southern Hemisphere wheat, shipments of which continued heavy. Argentine shipped 7,008,000 and Australia 2,612,000 bushels during the week, and stocks on coast passage totaled over 57,000,000 bushels. Arrivals at United Kingdom and Continental ports totaled 8,648,000 bushels. Prices of foreign wheats advanced 2c-4c per bushel at Liverpool, with Argentine Rosafé for February shipment quoted at $1.21 3-4. Australian wheat for March shipment at $1.33 1-8, and No. 2 Manitoba from Vancouver at $1.48 1-2 per bushel. New Indian wheat for May and June shipment was quoted at $1.27 3-4 per bushel. The Indian crop has recently been benefited by widespread rains.

SYNOPSIS

Ossie Merrill, star footballer of Bellport High School and Paddy O'Riley, second string quarterback, are rivals for the affections of the pretty cheer leader, Susie Reynolds. Merrill goes to Sierra College in California while Paddy enters a small eastern college, Green Ridge. Three years later, Ossie is All-American at Sierra, Paddy is still a second stringer. They come back to Bellport for summer vacation. With Paddy is his close mate, Dutch Schultz, Green Ridge football. The band is playing at the station when they arrive—but not for them. Ossie is arriving on another train!

CHAPTER III

DUTCH and Paddy got off the Westbound train at Bellport just a few minutes before the Eastbound, bearing Ossie Merrill, was scheduled to arrive. They found the town's band and most of the citizenry gathered to welcome the football hero from Sierra, but nobody paid the slightest attention to the men from Green Ridge.

"Welcome O-S-S-I-E," puzzled Schultz, as he studied a big banner hanging across the station entrance. "Funny way to spell O'Riley."

"Yeah. Just a quaint local custom. Mind waiting?"

"But we're here, and nothing happens."

"Aw, cut it. Ossie Merrill plays football at Sierra. I hear he's going to be All-American full back next year. You're a full back too, aren't you, Mr. Schultz?"

"Not the kind that hangs around the outskirts and then falls on the ball with his number to the press box," grunted Dutch, who read the sports news, despite all his pretended ignorance.

"Ossie doesn't know it," continued Paddy casually as he found a seat on a baggage truck, "but he's going to help me find out something." His eyes searched the crowd, then he added, "I don't see her. Maybe she's cured."

"Who? The frounce who dishes out the ice cream cones?"

"What are you talking about? Paddy jumped as if a pin had pricked him.

"Just what you've talked about in your sleep! Teah! Teah!"

"In my sleep! Look Dutch, be a good guy—tell me what I said."

"What? Schultz was smug. "Squal on your subconscious. It would never speak to me again."

Paddy's protest was cut short by a train whistle. A few moments later the Eastbound Express pulled in. On the observation platform stood Ossie. Beside him was a very pretty girl dressed in the height of fashion.

"Well, they pay me for it every week," grinned the girl.

"Paddy," Dutch dragged his friend forward, "meet the former belle of Pasadena High, Florence Taylor. She's in the movies now. Flossie, meet Paddy O'Riley. But remember—he's on the second team."

"Not if I were coach," laughed the girl. Then, as the conductor shouted "Board!" she bade a hasty farewell to Ossie, who had stood by, too dumbfounded to speak.

Dutch stared fixedly after the departing train until Paddy snapped his fingers in front of his friend's eyes. "Hey! You remember me, don't you?" he shouted. "I'm your host, Mr. O'Riley. Better put on your shoes. You'll get athlete's foot."

"I might remind you," Susie was saying to Cheers some hours later at the Sweetery, "that a watched boy friend never boils."

Her sister pretended to ignore the remark, but she turned from the window and turned on the radio so loud that it made the dishes rattle.

"Who? The frounce who dishes out the ice cream cones?"

"What are you talking about? Paddy jumped as if a pin had pricked him.

"Just what you've talked about in your sleep! Teah! Teah!"

"In my sleep! Look Dutch, be a good guy—tell me what I said."

"Just what you've talked about in your sleep! Teah! Teah!"

"Yeah," Paddy was annoyed. "Accost on the 'riv'." He turned to Dutch and added, "Here's a long-promised treat. This is Austin Merrill. Ossie, this is Dutch Schultz."

"Glad to know you, Schultz. You play at that—what's the name of that little college?"

"Green Ridge!" The answer was fast.

"Oh, sure, now I remember." Ossie was honestly embarrassed.

"That's just dandy. Now we're famous," snapped Dutch. Then to Paddy: "Say, if you're going to have lunch and make that train..."

"Be seeing you," Ossie said to Dutch after the others had bid him farewell.

"Any time," growled the husky player. "Swords or dirty looks at twenty paces."

Ossie couldn't quite ignore this insult. "Say, O'Riley," he called as the two friends reached the door. "Hoo Green Ridge got a mascot?"

"Why? Paddy was wary.

"Well, Princeton has a Tiger and Yale a Bulldog. I thought maybe Green Ridge might have a jackass."

"Funny thing, Cheers," Ossie began again lamely. "I never remembered Bellport being so kind of—shrivelled. Guess the place hasn't changed though—I probably have."

"If Ossie Merrill wants to see me," she couldn't help answering at last. "He knows my address."

"For three years he forgot to remember it—even on a post card."

"But you just got here!" The girl was dumbfounded.

"Yes, I know—but I've got a lot of people to see before I leave."

"I suppose you have," she said sadly.

"Funny thing, Cheers," he began again lamely. "I never remembered Bellport being so kind of—shrivelled. Guess the place hasn't changed, though—I probably have. Well, bye..."

"It's been nice seeing you," she answered listlessly.

When Paddy returned that afternoon after seeing Dutch to the train he found Cheers sitting disconsolately at the fountain.
