CONSERVATION

Continued from page one. vallis to formulate suggestions for changes in the 1938 program.

Representative farmers were at the conference from all leading farm sections of the state, many of them being men who have had experience with the inner workings of the AAA through service on community, county or state committees. Following are excerpts from the opinions expressed by a few of these men in the course of the conference.

E. H. Miller, Lexington: "The wheat farmers of the Columbia basin are finding that the program is far more than a mere sop thrown to us in the form of benefit payments. We have been able to turn thousands of acres of low-producing land back to grass, and saved other thousands from blow damage through following the practices encouraged under the program. We are not fooled by temporary dollar wheat, and would like a continuation of a program which will encourage continued diversion of the poorer lands into grass instead of wheat."

Frank B. Harlow, Eugene: "Applying the program to smaller diversified fruit farms has not been simple. We are primarily interested in maintaining fertility and preventing erosion in our orchards and berry fields. The 1937 program strongly encourages the use of winter cover crops, and we would like to see this extended even further."

E. H. DeLong, LaGrande: The majority of our farmers see more in the program than the benefit payments, and we expect more from it. As a dairyman, I find the 1937 program more applicable than the first one, and I think the 1938 program may be improved without making radical changes. Union county has reduced its wheat acreage and is attacking the problem of wind erosion."

Robert L. Weir, Lakeview: "The 1936 range program was a 'dinger,' and did us a lot of good. Unfortunately the 1937 program is not so good since the building of outside fences was eliminated as an improvement practice. I believe it is a fundamental conservation practice both for private and publically owned range land to encourage adequate fencing of range holdings."
