Children usually want to help in the pre-holiday cookie preparations and it is so easy to plan for this. Combine the ingredients, chill the dough, and then allow the children to do their own cutting and shaping. Gingerbread men are not easily spoiled from over handling and they are a thrill to behold when they are out of the oven and dressed in coats of colored icing. A favorite recipe may be on hand but this one is good, too.

Old fashioned aunt-Sally, I should think that a night club would be the last place a girl of your station would go. Sally—Yes, it usually is.

For no special reason, but very definitely, butter lends a flavor in cookery that is unequalled, and its use in making of the "best of holiday sweets," cookies, should encourage the most inexperienced cook.

Cookies are what you make them. It is a good plan to have them always on hand—plain whole some cookies for all the family every day; rich and satisfying ones for hearty appetites; and dainty decorative cookies for holiday seasons. But, no matter what, their success remains dependent on the fine selection of ingredients, especially butter; and these simple rules of preparation:

a. using cold ingredients and combining them quickly.
b. chilling the dough at least 20 minutes before rolling out.
c. handling no more than one-fourth of the dough at a time and this on a cold board with little flour
