All Who Pass Are Not Good Drivers

Ability to meet the requirements of the test set out by law before a motor vehicle operator's license can be issued does not necessarily qualify the applicant to become a safe driver. It is true that no one should be allowed to operate a motor vehicle upon our streets and highways who cannot meet these requirements, but much more is necessary for safety than is required by law.

The great majority of our drivers are capable of safe driving. In a recent check of 12,000 accidents in a neighboring state it was found that more than 75 per cent of the drivers had not been involved in an accident for eight years. In a great many fatal accidents the drivers involved have not had a previous accident record.

Lack of proper instruction at the time of beginning has undoubtedly been the cause of poor driving in many cases, but lack of proper care and attention on the part of people who should be safe drivers is the cause of a great many more accidents. Operation of a motor vehicle on our highways has become literally a life and death matter and the man or woman who drives should accept in all seriousness the responsibility that this privilege carries.

Oregon's fatality record last month showed improvement over the same year ago, and the interest being taken in reducing the toll of motor vehicle accidents is real basis for hope that this reduction will be continued. Communities in every section of the state are taking hold of this problem in a serious manner, and leading citizens are devoting time and effort to its solution, especially as to the removing of the hazards in their own vicinity. If work of this type is continued, it is bound to result in a reduction of Oregon's traffic deaths.
