HIGHWAYS OF HISTORY

HISTORICAL associations, identity of interests and common aspirations serve to create and foster a spirit of international amity between the Western States and Canada's Pacific Province, British Columbia. Many thousands of Americans visit this scenic section of the Dominion annually and almost everywhere along the highways they find evidence of the happy fashion in which events have shaped themselves to draw the two nations close together. In the sketch map (left), a few examples are indicated. Between Blaine and Douglas, the International gateways north of Seattle, stands the Peace Arch, a structure which the pennies and nickels of school children caused to be built in commemoration of the long years of unbroken friendship between the two countries. At Quamel on the Cariboo Trail a tablet records a high adventure in communication. After the failure of the Atlantic Cable in 1858, an attempt was made to connect America and Europe by telegraph across the Bering Straits and Asia but the successful laying of the Atlantic Cable in 1866, ended the overland route at Quamel to which point wires had been strung from the border. At Prince George, a cairn recalls the epochal journey of Sir Alexander Mackenzie across the mountains to the Pacific Ocean in 1793, twelve years prior to the equally famous trip of Lewis and Clark through the Rockies to Oregon. Had Mackenzie's record of his trip been less complete it is possible that the feat of Lewis and Clark would have resulted in the whole of the British Columbia coast becoming a part of the United States. Prince George also was the scene of many of the activities of John Ogden, the trapper, after whom the city of Ogden, Utah, is named. It is the gateway to one of the best hunting and game fishing areas of Canada and to Hazelton and the Skeena River districts which are famous for their Indian totem poles. The making of these poles is a lost art among the Indians today and the Canadian Government has taken vigorous steps to protect and preserve the fine specimens that are to be found in this part of British Columbia, particularly at Kitwanga near Hazelton.

Mr. and Mrs. Dean Olds were The Dalles visitors Saturday.

Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Kruow and son of Moro were dinner guests of Mrs. Maude Garrett Sunday. Blanche Garrett returned home after spending the week with the Kruows.

Mrs. C. H. Oestrich entertained twenty children at her home Saturday afternoon with an Easter party. After games and an egg hunt, ice cream and cookies were served.
