Added evidence that lack of sleep is a leading cause in fatal automobile accidents was brought forward this week by Secretary of State Earl Snell, who said that according to Oregon accident statistics for 1937, the proportion of fatal accidents to non-fatal accidents is highest between the hours of five and six o'clock in the morning.

Drivers at this hour who have gone without sleep since the preceding morning, are apt to be dulled by fatigue," Snell said. "In this condition they are not only more likely to become involved in accidents, but the accidents which do occur are more likely to be fatal, since the driver will be unable to avoid direct collisions with other automobiles or fixed objects."

Least deadly are the morning and early afternoon hours, from seven o'clock until about three o'clock on, however, those which occurred between five and six in the morning were fatal, according to Snell. Thus the early morning hour accident was 20 times as deadly as the accident just before noon.

Less than one fifth of one per cent of the accidents reported between eleven o'clock and noon last year resulted fatally, while about three and one-half per cent of those which occurred between five and six in the morning were fatal, according to Snell. Thus the early morning hour accident was 20 times as deadly as the accident just before noon.

Drivers at this hour who have gone without sleep since the preceding morning, are apt to be dulled by fatigue," Snell said. "In this condition they are not only more likely to become involved in accidents, but the accidents which do occur are more likely to be fatal, since the driver will be unable to avoid direct collisions with other automobiles or fixed objects."
