Sitting Bull Relics At U of O Museum

The tomahawk carried by Sitting Bull, famous Indian warrior, from the time he was 18 until after his capture, can now be grasped and its grisly history speculated on by students of the University of Oregon and visitors to the Oregon Museum of Natural History, it was announced here by Dr. L. S. Crossman, director of the museum.

The war weapon, a lethal-looking instrument with an unusually long handle, and numerous other relics once owned by this noted Sioux chief, are included in a collection loaned to the museum by Mrs. Sarah A. Evans, of Oswego.

The articles give an intimate picture of Sitting Bull, for included are some actual pictures, many of them highly colored in typical plains Indian style, drawn by the warrior while he was a prisoner of the United States army. Some of the pictures depict him in action, ruthlessly slaying his enemies. The collection also includes some actual photographs of the chief, other Indians, and army Indian fighters, taken in the early 1880's.

The collection includes two typical Indian pipes owned by Sitting Bull, one of which is made from the red stone mentioned by Longfellow in his Hiawatha tale. The chief's tobacco pouch, with his name on it, and some other pouches decorated with colorful beads and porcupine quills are also interesting.

In addition to the authentic Sitting Bull articles, the collection contains two human hair scalp locks, stone-headed war clubs, a shell neck piece worn by Sitting Bull's son at the time the boy and his father were slain, metal
