SCHOOL ENDS

This week the schools of Sherman county start their yearly duty of delivering new citizens to the communities in which they are situated. These youngsters have finished a part of their formal education beyond which many of them will not go. It is a proper time to examine the system under which this teaching has been administered.

From the report of the American Youth Commission of the American Council of Education which was published in 1937 it is learned that the educators making the report felt that the following topics were needs of the educational process:

Educating for citizenship. Without criticizing the schools of the county for the content of their courses in social science and kindred subjects, it is a common observation that more of practical citizenship would be gained by the children if they were in larger groups.

Education for Home Membership. It is doubtful if anyone but a professional educator would place information on this subject in the list of school subjects. Surely if anything is to be left to the parents this type of education might well be so left.

Education for Leisure Life. There are those who would agree that in this classification the schools have attained their most distinguished success. Knowledge of sports, games, social activities and diversions are naturally a part of this sort of education.

Vocational Efficiency. Greatest criticism of the schools of this county is the lack of vocational training given. In schools the size of these any attempt to give training in the trades must take away from the school a part of its proper and original function which is to train the mind in the fundamentals of knowledge. As long as we restrict the high school pupil to four subjects we cannot effectively teach carpentry and canning, decorating and dishwashing, athletics and agriculture and expect him to find time for English history and mathematics. We've been trying to eat our cake and have it too about as long as we can keep up the pretense.

Physical and Mental Health. The schools have charge of the young people at the period of their lives when they are most healthy and can not expect too much credit for the natural growth and development of the children. Training in good habits of exercise and posture for the whole school should be of more value than a winning ball season.

Preparation for Continued Learning. If an intellectual curiosity is aroused in high school it will very likely cause the child to go on to school or at least to do some studying in other ways. If there is no desire to learn there is no value in going on to school. The greatest one thing that a high school teacher might give his or her pupils would be the insatiable desire to know more about things. Everyone knows of some average child who worked against odds and obtained an education with which he made himself valuable to the community; everyone knows some mentally well endowed boy or girl who achieved nothing. The purpose of education should be to aid and encourage every child to reach the maximum of development. With that as an ideal the schools have a long road to travel.

HENRY'S ACRES

A few years ago a traveler on the roads of Sherman county either saw fields planted to wheat or fields in summer fallow, a great part of which was free from weeds or other material on the surface.

Now one may see wheat fields, or a gray expanse of territory that indicates that something has happened to the stubble, or there may be another kind of view. All over the county there are patches of what appears to be weeds or there is land entirely uncultivated and grown up to grass. These are Henry's contributions to the welfare of the county's agriculture. It may be that these weed patches will eventually be the salvation of the county; it is possible that this abandoned land will be the means of bringing prosperity in great measure to those who do nothing with their acres; perhaps the weed seed from these areas will not germinate on land that is being used for crops or become a menace to the agriculture of the county and maybe it will rain every day in June.

Certainly if the methods of reducing the wheat acreage had been left to men with more information about local conditions or men who lived closer than Washington D. C. it could have been done much better and with less danger to the success of a permanent policy.

NOW GOING ON IN THE BIG TENT

This is the time of year in the dry farming country when the home grown supply of hope thins out in the farmer's breast as he plants his wheat begins to shrivel in the warm east wind. It is a rule that is observed each year that the hope shrivels long before the wheat does.

Raising wheat is a hair raising job at best; something like watching a troupe of acrobats tumbling and twist high up in the air. A spectator knows that they won't fall to the ground but it looks like they couldn't help it most of the time. It's the same way with growing wheat. Nearly every year there just don't seem to be any chance for the wheat to mature into anything big enough to interest Henry Wallace and yet early always does by some gift of circumstances, fortunate turn of the weather or providential rain.

It is far too early to say whether this year will be the one in which the grain does actually struggle into the net like an acrobat that missed his rope. We'll need rain. Probably after days or weeks of wanting it we will get a crop of wheat and can thereafter refer to 1939 as the year in which, "if it hadn't rained just when it did, I wouldn't have got nothin'." It's quite a thrill while it lasts.

Now let's see. The waterfowl employers can't stop work because the men refuse to work and the men can see a picket line whether it is there or not and an agreement is an agreement whether both sides hold to it or not and we try one side of a case at once. Is it right or is there another law covering that case?

A recent story in The Dalles Chronicle tells of the attempt that will be made by sportsmen of that city to prevent the closure of a part of the Deschutes river to fishermen. Earlier in the year it was reported that a group of sportsmen from the same city were arranging for a private road to another part of the Deschutes with the assumption that they would have the right to bar others from the use of the road. In our own county we have a problem that is somewhat similar. It appears that if one has control of a bit of good fishing it is perfectly all right to retain it, but if someone else has it, it is a sin.

Last week the Sherman County Journal announced that it was time for rain. This week we report the first shower for more than 60 days. This is not a boast merely the statement of two facts. We know the paper was widely read and this evidence that its columns were perused by those in charge of rain making while not surprising, is gratifying to say the least.

speculation as to Governor Sprague's intention in that direction, but the change in department leads has only served to increase the uneasiness felt by the commission's small army of employees. While it is not believed the new commissioner will go in for any general housecleaning there are a number of highly lucrative jobs in the department now being held by democrats which look mighty tempting to republican patriots who are becoming impatient at the administration's delay in distributing what they regard as the rightful spoils of a partisan victory.

Judge Wallace's resignation was not entirely unexpected. While Governor Sprague had indicated no intention of removing the commissioner for whom he held a high personal regard, Wallace's health was such as to force his retirement.

Over in the department of agriculture the situation is entirely different. The re-appointment of I. D. Mickle as Director has served to quiet the tension that has prevailed in the department for the past several months. This appointment did contain an element of surprise inasmuch as it had been pretty generally understood that Mickle who has been in the service of the state for many years, was about ready to retire to private life and only awaited the selection of a successor before stepping out of the picture.

The Board of Control this week gave its approval to plans for two new building projects. One of these was the new dining room and hospital to be constructed at the state prison proper. The other was the new dormitory to be constructed on the site of the prison annex, five miles south of Salem and which will house first offenders sentenced to short terms for minor crimes. This latter project calls for a three story concrete building 52 by 150 feet in size with dormitory accommodations for 200 prisoners, all of whom will be employed in the farming activities of the prison. Prison labor will be employed in the construction of both buildings.

The 1939 session laws will be ready for distribution in about ten days. The 555 new laws enacted by the recent session will cover 1275 pages and will constitute the largest volume of its kind in the history of Oregon.

Evert's Oregon Almanac, a photostatic copy of which has just been secured by the state library reveals the fact that the needs of the poor was one of the first considerations of the earliest settlers of this Pacific northwest country. In the first public meeting held by the settlers south of the Columbia river, provision was made for the appointment of two "overscers of the poor." This meeting was held in the American Mission station on February 17, 1841.

Oregon's industrial curve points definitely upward, according to statistics compiled by the Industrial Accident commission. Business in this state during the first four months of 1939 was better than for any similar period during the past ten years with the exception of 1937. Industrial payroll for the four month period aggregated $46,884,797, an increase of approximately $2,500,000 over the same period in 1938. Oregon industries employed 109,400 men during April this year or 700 more than were given employment in the same industries in April of last year.

One of the aspirants for a presidential nomination next year has a speech prepared denouncing the size of the agricultural bill. He was about to take the floor when he mentioned it to a colleague an astute chap, reminded the candidate that he comes from a farm state in the midwest and such an attack would cost him the farm vote. Without comment the aspirant returned the typewriter manuscript to his desk and locked it there. He was that close to blowing up his own boom.
