Harvard Student Upsets Girls' Hoop-Rolling Derby

Edward C. K. Reed of Villanova, Pa., president of the Harvard Lampoon, disguised himself as a girl and won the traditional Wellesley senior class hoop-rolling contest on the college campus in Wellesley, Mass. Reed is shown emerging from icy Lake Waban where he was tossed by the angry girls. The ducking occurred after Reed coyly accepted a bouquet of sweet peas and bashfully pointed out another Harvard youth as the "fiance" he would soon wed. Traditionally, the winners of the hoop-rolling rage will be the first of her class to marry.

Buckskin Good For Dry Country

The material most commonly used in making mens' and boys' clothing was buckskin, says the Oregon Writers' project in telling of early day clothing. Buckskin garments were fairly successful in a dry climate, but in a locality like the Willamette valley, the excessive rain frequently made them uncomfortable. Buckskin stretches when wet, becomes very pliable, but in drying shrinks and becomes very hard. In drying buckskin breeches often assumed a shape entirely unrelated to their original pattern. The distortion was not so noticeable when a man was sitting down because the breeches in drying accommodated themselves to that position, the knees and seat bagging. The wearer, upon standing, sometimes found it impossible to rise to his full height, the unyielding breeches compelling him to maintain the position they had assumed in drying. It is said that upon hunting expeditions during rainy weather a man with buckskin clothing would be occupied a large part of the time in rolling up the constantly stretching legs of his breeches.

Even after it was possible to obtain bolt goods, buckskin was still a standby for mens' ad boys' clothing. Many living Oregon pioneers recall wearing buckskin clothes as boys. These garments unbeautiful, but extremely serviceable in stretching and drying frequently made grotesque figures of early Oregon adolescents.
