Trips to the New York fair and to Detroit for new automobiles were given as the principal reasons for the long trips. The San Francisco fair remains the goal for the greatest volume of Oregon travelers, it was pointed out.

Far fewer Oregonians are planning vacations at Oregon resorts, the announcement declared. Local recreational areas with few exceptions find it difficult to compete with wide spread publicity of both world fairs.

Feeder Lambs May Be Fed In Oregon

The Pacific Northwest produces 500,000 feeder lambs annually that are shipped to the middle-west to be fattened, according to extension figures at Oregon State college. If these lambs were fattened at home on local wheat, 1,000,000 bushels of the northwest's annual 10,000,000 bushel grain surplus could be utilized. Other types of livestock could use even more.

Since world wheat prices have dropped during late years as a result of over production, the Oregon State college experiment station has attempted to find other channels through which Oregon wheat growers can market their grain. When properly handled, wheat has been found to be just as good as corn, or for that matter any other grain, for livestock fattening.

A forthcoming bulletin, written by E. L. Potter, chief of the division of agricultural economics, and E. A. Lindgren, extension animal husbandman at Oregon State college, discusses the possibilities of using wheat as a livestock feed.

From the results shown in the publication, wheat, as a fattener, can be used advantageously in livestock production in Oregon. Each year Oregon feeder lambs are shipped to the mid-west corn belt for several weeks intensive feeding before they are sent on to markets. The experiments were aimed at finding a way to eliminate this step in the route to market and definitely favorable results have been obtained with wheat in feeding projects.

Thousands of cattle make the same trip each year to the corn belt states for fattening, although wheat can be used successfully to fatten cattle. The authors of the bulletin also have an eye on the probability of an increase in the swine population in the state, since the far west is an importing area from the mid-west. The bulletin is not off the press but is expected to be ready for distribution later this summer.
