MORO SCHOOL NOTES by Claudine Thompson

After the celebration of the Sherman county fair, the students of Moro High came back for a full week of school.

On Monday a student body meeting was called to discuss whether or not to sell the alumni season tickets for the volleyball games and the school paper. It was decided and the price was set at $1.00 for a season ticket to the volleyball games and a subscription to the school paper. If the alumni are going away to school and want the high school paper for a semester, but cannot be here to attend the games, they may subscribe to the paper for 20 cents a semester.

Both the boys and the girls have started practicing Volleyball this week. The first game is Friday, September 29, with Wasco there. Mr. Cunliff told the school that Rufus will not have a Volleyball team this year due to the fact that only three girls are in the high school. Therefore there will be only four schools in the county competition in athletics this year.

Oregon Farmers Plant Shelterbelts

Special to the Sherman County Journal from Washington D. C.—Oregon farmers planted 145,550 trees last year for shelter belts and the same number, exactly, for wood production. The plantings were under the Clark-McNary law, which provides for the allotment federal funds to states matching such appropriations for carrying on fire protection work in forests and for furnishing forest tree seedlings to farmers. The tree distribution is made by state forestry agencies and the trees are used only for forest planting on farms.

Oregon farmers planted the trees 50-50, half for windbreaks to protect crops and soil, livestock, farm buildings and gardens from damaging winds. Farmers report a saving in fuel in houses sheltered by trees and a saving in feed when windbreaks are used around feed lots.

In Washington state 62,100 trees went for wind breaks and 20,700 were planted for wood production. The Dakotas, Wyoming, Montana, Idaho and Colorado made their plantings for wind breaks. Nevada, apparently, did not plant a tree.
