Another important contribution of "Caterpillar" Engineers to highly mechanized large-scale farming of the West was revealed yesterday by P. G. O'Meara, when he announced a new, more powerful, more versatile "Caterpillar" Diesel D6 Tractor.

The new machine is a 55hp track-type tractor and is the latest addition to the well-known line of agricultural tractors. It has been built to meet the problem of the speeded-up work schedules under which the modern farmer works without increasing his operating cost. This modern tractor has five forward speeds, ranging from a low of 1.4 to a high of 5.8 miles per hour.

It has the well balanced weight typical of all "Caterpillar" track-type tractors and it is a rugged, heavy-duty machine with ample capacity for operating with bulldozer for clearing and other farm construction work with ditchers, chisels and other heavy cultivating machines. Yet it can be handled as easy as an automobile, thanks to a new "Caterpillar" development, the hydraulic booster-type steering.

Fence Post Farm Gives Results Of Tests

Douglas fir fence posts used untreated have given better service in the experimental post farm at Oregon State than those charred or treated with asphalt emulsion, according to the latest progress report on preservative treatment of fence posts, prepared by J. J. Starker, professor of forestry, and issued by the Oregon engineering experiment station.

All of the untreated, charred, and asphalt emulsion treated Douglas fir posts, set some ten years ago, have now failed and been removed, as have several other species included in the 1442 posts which are under test since the experiment started. Untreated Douglas fir gave average service of 82 months, charred Douglas fir average service of 76 months and the asphalt emulsion treated Douglas fir average service only 75 months, or slightly over six years.

Other species that have completely failed with an average service of from four and a half to six years are cottonwood, alder, madrone, big-leaf maple, and small sized, cascara post. The various cedar and juniper posts are still in good condition after 10 years and none of the Douglas fir posts treated by the so-called salt method have failed.

Douglas fir posts treated with crank case oil and creosote have not lasted as well as those treated with creosote alone. A post is considered to have failed when it gives way under a 50-pound pull two feet from the ground.
