Morning Glory Land Now Producing Crop

Eastern Oregon wheat land that had been abandoned to morning glories is now producing 38-bushel wheat crops on the morning glory control station in Umatilla county. The method used in control has been that of cultivation and cropping, reports Lawrence Jenkins, assistant extension specialist in farm crops at O.S.C.

This weed control experimental area was established several years ago under the terms of a special legislative appropriation. Work has been carried on by L. E. Harris, assistant agronomist of the experiment station assigned to weed research throughout the state.

Weed infested land on the area, handled under the normal summer fallow method, yielded only seven to ten bushels of wheat per acre in 1940, compared to a 38 bushel yield on the managed land. The experiment has shown that it is practical to continue cropping land, obtaining a wheat crop every other year, and at the same time control morning glories.

The big improvement in cultivation practices tried out on the area has been extending the time between cultivations, says Jenkins. The best yields of wheat have been obtained where the morning glory infested area was cultivated 12 times during the season. It was formerly considered essential to cultivate often enough to prevent the weeds from emerging to the light. It has since been found that cultivating perennial weeds every two weeks will bring about eradication fully as soon, and usually more quickly, than cultivating every week.

There is some difference in the elapsed period for various weeds, Jenkins points out. It appears possible to allow a longer interval on Canada thistle and Russian knapweed than is safe for white-top and morning glory, although all of these weeds have been killed in from two to three years with cultivations made four or five inches deep every two weeks. As the season advances the weeds come back more slowly, making it possible to lengthen the intervals between cultivations even more.

The experimental work is being continued to work out further details of best and most economical methods. It has not yet been determined how many years will be required to effect complete eradication where intensive cultivation is used every other year with a crop grown in between.

Allotment Rules May Be Changed

Elimination of the total soil-depleting acreage allotment for farms under the AAA program is in prospect for 1942, reports N. C. Donaldson, state executive officer of the AAA, and W. L. Teutsch, assistant director of extension, who were members of the Oregon delegation attending the conference in Washington, D. C., on the 1942 program.

The proposed change, which was recommended by the conference and is expected to be proclaimed soon, would permit greater flexibility, found needed during the defense period when increases are essential in certain types of crops from time to time. The elimination of the total soil-depleting allotment would make unnecessary changing the designation of such crops.

To compensate for this change, it was further proposed that greater emphasis be placed on the growing of soil-conserving crops and that the benefits in these be increased somewhat. Allotments for the main surplus crops, such as wheat, will remain, of course, under the new plan. Numerous other recommendations were made by the conference, mostly pertaining to special conditions under the defense program.

"After all, things haven't changed so very much. We were just reading about a Greek Maiden who sat up all night listening to a lyre."

"Do you know the Jackknife dive?" asked Sam. "Do I?" chorled Charley. "I was there when they raided it."
