Ways to Save Sugar For Canning Told

With fruit conservation a patriotic duty this year, cleaning the strawberry fields for the small of late berries is one way to help. While these berries take longer to pick and prepare, they are really sweeter and have more of the true strawberry flavor and aroma than the larger, earlier berries, points out Miss Lucy Case, extension specialist in nutrition.

Incidentally, strawberries are an excellent source of vitamin C, as well as being a universal favorite for their taste.

Miss Case also suggests a method for canning these berries in a manner economical of sugar and one which will minimize or eliminate the separation of the berries from the juice by floating to the top of the jar. To eliminate this floating she suggests handling the fresh berries as soon after they are hulled as possible, after which they are boiled briefly—not more than two or three minutes—in hot sirup and let stand overnight in a covered pan.

The sirup suggested under present sugar restrictions is 25 per cent strength made by adding one-half cup sugar to 1½ cups water. It takes about one to 1½ cups of this sirup to a quart of finished product.

By heating the berries and letting them remain in the sirup overnight they absorb the sugar which replaces the air and thus reduces the tendency to float. These plump berries retain their color and flavor better than those that are canned immediately after sugar is added.

A longer pre-boil is recommended.

ed for firm berries such as Corvallis, and for berries that are not very mature. A shorter boil is used for softer varieties such as the Marshall and for overmature fruit.

The canning process is completed the next morning by bringing the berries to the scalding point and then packing in sterilized jars and boiling for 10 minutes in a bath one inch deeper than the jars. They are then removed and sealed.

"After many years of profound research" says Prof. Bfrska of the Corvallis history department, "we believe we can safely say, without fear of successful contradiction, that women used cosmetics freely in the middle ages."

Cripes, mister, they still use cosmetics freely in the middle ages.

DEPENDABILITY

In these times more than usual it is important to have a dependable grocer-- In wartime prices and quality and even quantities are subject to change.
