Casualties on the home front, through accidents, are striking hard at the war effort of this nation and must be eliminated in interests of the preservation of our way of life," according to statements from the office of the safety division.

The statement points to the list of 30,000 American workmen killed and 2,500,000 wounded since Pearl Harbor, compared to a total of 44,143 casualties in the American armed forces since Pearl Harbor, as tragic evidence of the need for preventing accidents in this country.

"Casualties on the battlefield are a regrettable sacrifice to perpetuate our way of life," said Earl Snell, secretary of state, in commenting on these figures which were released by the National Safety Council. "Casualties on the
