Good Fruit Depends On Good Canning

Good canning methods do not stop with the food safely in the jars, but call for continued care through cooking and storing, says Miss Lucy Case, extension nutritionist at OSC. Some questions and answers regarding this stage of food preservation follow:

Q. Why shouldn't jars be stood on their heads to cool, since this shows up leaks.

A. A good seal is more likely to be obtained if the jars are left right side up during the cooling stage. Test later for leaks.

Q. How can I test jars for leaks?

A. Test seals the day after canning, after removing any screwbands that held on metal or glass disks during canning. A well-sealed metal disk is slightly drawn inward at the center. You can also test it by tapping with a spoon a ringing sound shows a good seal; a dull sound, an imperfect seal. A further test, for glass as well as metal disks, is to lift the jar by the disk using finger tips, to see whether it has sealed firmly. To test types with rubber rings leave the jar upside down for several minutes after it is cool to see if any drops ooze out.

Q. How long will home canned food keep—several years?

A. In normal times of food plenty, home economists advise eating up canned foods within the year. But longer storage is not unsafe if foods are properly canned, sealed airtight and kept in a cool dark storage place. Foods kept for a long time lose some food value, color and texture.

Q. When I opened some jars of home canned food, the metal lids were discolored. Does this affect the food, which seems quite all right?

A. This discoloration of the metal is not unusual. It does not affect the food unless the cap actually rusts through.

The high cost of living

The low price
of electricity

LOOK AT THE COST OF LIVING—up 25.4% since 1939*
Then look at the average kilowatt-hour price of P.P.&L. electricity—down 21% for residential service during the same period!

Part of this reduction in the average cost of electricity is due to increased use of electrical helpers, which automatically moves users into the lower steps of our progressive rate schedules. But even more important have been the three rate reductions and the two "rate dividends" received by our customers in the past five years.

These forward steps have cut the average price we get for residential electric service from 2.36 cents per kilowatt-hour in 1939 to only 1.86 cents at the present time.

And compared with 15 years ago, the average home served by P.P.&L. is now using about twice as much electricity—at no more cost.

The actual record of steady reduction in the cost of your electric service is your assurance of continued better value in the future.
