Turkey Raisers Tend To Rush Market

A recent tendency of some turkey growers to rush birds to market for fear of a price decline is not considered sound business by Noel L. Bennion, extension poultry specialist at OSC. The movement followed the removal of the army set-aside order on turkeys September 24.

The way to avoid an early market glut and further decline in price is for growers to market their birds in an orderly manner, says Bennion. It is never a good plan to sell turkeys before they are in prime condition, he adds. Hens favorable to him.

set on an average of at least two weeks before toms and are best sold accordingly. If an adequate supply of mash or pellets is not available, turkeys can be finished on grains and green feed.

Bennion also calls attention to a possible surplus of hatching eggs and poults next spring as a result of an indicated 25 to 30 percent increase in the number of breeder hens carried over this season compared with a year ago. The cost of producing poults and eggs will continue high while a surplus will inevitably cut prices.
